
Goody Twoshoes.

THE HISTORY OF LITTLE GOODY TWOSHOES;

OTHERWISE CALLED

Mrs. Margery Twoſhoes.

WITH

The Means by which ſhe acquired her Learning and Wiſdom, and in Conſequence thereof her Eſtate.

Set forth at large for the Benefit of thoſe,

Who from a State of Rags and Care,
And having Shoes but half a Pair,
Their Fortune and their Fame would fix,
And gallop in their Coach and Six.

See the original Manuſcript in the VATICAN at ROME, and the Cuts by MICHAEL ANGELO; illuſtrated with the Comments of our great modern Criticks.

THE FIRST WORCESTER EDITION.

PRINTED at WORCESTER, Maſſachuſetts.
By ISAIAH THOMAS,
And SOLD, Wholeſale and Retail, at his Book Store. MDCCLXXXVII.

PZ6
.G439
H
Office

286403

TO ALL

YOUNG

GENTLEMEN AND LADIES,

WHO ARE GOOD,

OR INTEND TO BE GOOD,

This AMERICAN EDITION,

IS INSCRIBED BY

THEIR OLD FRIEND

IN WORCESTER.

THE RENOWNED

HISTORY

OF

Little Goody Twoſhoes;

COMMONLY CALLED

OLD GOODY TWOSHOES.

PART I.

INTRODUCTION. By the Editor.

ALL the world muſt allow, that Twoſhoes was not her real name. No; her father's name was Meanwell, and he was for many years a conſiderable farmer in the pariſh where Margery was born; but by the misformisfortunes which he met with in buſineſs, and the wicked perſecutions of Sir Timothy Gripe, and an overgrown farmer called Graſpall, he was effectually ruined.

216403

The caſe was thus. The pariſh of Mouldwell, where they lived, had for many ages been let by the lord of the manor into twelve different farms, in which the tenants lived comfortably, brought up large families, and carefully ſupported the poor people who laboured for them; until the eſtate, by marriage and by death, came into the hands of Sir Timothy.

This gentleman, who loved himſelf better than all his neighbours, thought it leſs trouble to write one receipt for his rent than twelve, and farmer Graſpall offering to take all the farms as the leaſes expired, Sir Timothy agreed with him, and in proceſs of time

time he was poſſeſſed of every farm, but that occupied by little Margery's father; which he alſo wanted; for as Mr. Meanwell was a charitable good man, he ſtood up for the poor at the pariſh meetings, and was unwilling to have them oppreſſed by Sir Timothy, and this avaricious farmer.—Judge, oh kind, humane and courteous reader, what a terrible ſituation the poor muſt be in, when this covetous man was perpetual overſeer, and every thing for their maintenance was drawn from his hard heart and cruel hand. But he was not only perpetual overſeer, but perpetual church warden; and judge, oh ye Chriſtians, what ſtate the church muſt be in, when ſupported by a man without religion or virtue. He was alſo perpetual ſurveyor of the highways, and what ſort of roads he kept up for

216403

for the convenience of travellers, thoſe beſt know, who have had the misfortune to be obliged to paſs through that pariſh.—Complaints indeed were made, but to what purpoſe are complaints, when brought againſt a man, who can hunt, drink, and ſmoke with the lord of the manor, who is alſo the juſtice of peace?

The oppoſition which little Margery's father made to this man's tyranny, gave offence to Sir Timothy, who endeavoured to force him out of his farm; and to oblige him to throw up the leaſe, ordered both a brick kiln and a dog kennel to be erected in the farmer's orchard. This was contrary to law, and a ſuit was commenced, in which Margery's father got the better. The ſame offence was again committed three different times, and as many actions brought, in all of which the farmer had a verdict and costs paid him; but notwithstanding these advantages, the law was so expensive, that he was ruined in the contest, and obliged to give up all he had to his creditors; which effectually answered the purpose of Sir Timothy, who erected those nuisances in the farmer's orchard with that intention only. Ah, my dear reader, we brag of liberty, and boast of our laws; but the blessings of the one, and the protection of the other seldom fall to the lot of the poor; and especially when a rich man is their adversary. How, in the name of goodness, can a poor wretch obtain redress, when thirty pounds are insufficient to try his cause? Where is he to find money to fee counsel, or how can he plead his cause himself (even if he was was permitted) when Engliſh laws are ſo obſcure, and ſo multiplied, that an abridgment of them cannot be contained in fifty volumes in folio?

in

286403

As ſoon as Mr. Meanwell had called together his creditors, Sir Timothy ſeized for a year's rent, and turned the farmer, his wife, little Margery, and her brother out of doors, without any of the neceſſaries of life to ſupport them.

This

This elated the heart of Mr. Graſpall, this crowned his hopes, and filled the meaſure of his iniquity; for beſides gratifying his revenge, this man's overthrow gave him the ſole dominion of the poor, whom he depreſſed and abuſed in a manner too horrible to mention.

Margery's father flew into another pariſh for ſuccour, and all thoſe who were able to move left their dwellings and ſought employments elſewhere, as they found it would be impoſſible to live under the tyranny of two ſuch people. The very old, the very lame and the blind were obliged to ſtay behind, and whether they were ſtarved, or what became of them, hiſtory does not ſay; but the character of the great Sir Timothy, and his avaricious tenant, were ſo infamous, that nobody would work for them by the day, and ſervants ſervants were afraid to engage themſelves by the year, leſt any unforeſeen accident ſhould leave them pariſhioners in a place, where they knew they muſt miſerably periſh; ſo that great part of the land lay untilled for ſome years, which was deemed a juſt reward for ſuch diabolical proceedings.

286403

But what, ſays the reader, can occaſion all this? Do you intend this for children, Mr. THOMAS? Why, do you ſuppoſe this is written by Mr. THOMAS, Sir? This comes from another hand. This is not the Book, Sir, mentioned in the title, but the introduction to that book; and it is intended, Sir, not for thoſe ſort of children, but for children of ſix feet high, of which, as my friend has juſtly obſerved, there are many millions in the world; and theſe reflecreflections, Sir, have been rendered neceſſary, by the unaccountable and diabolical ſcheme which people in England now give into, of laying a number of farms into one, and very often of a whole pariſh into one farm; which in the end muſt reduce the commom people to a ſtate of vaſſalage, worſe than that under the Barons of old, or of the clans in Scotland; and will in time depopulate the kingdom. But as you are tired of the ſubject, I ſhall take myſelf away, and you may viſit Little Margery. —So, Sir, your ſervant,

The EDITOR.

CHAP. I.

How and about Little Margery and her Brother.

CARE and diſcontent ſhortened the days of Little Margery's father.—He was forced from his family, and ſeized with a violent fever in a place where Dr. James's Powder was not to be had, and where he died miſerably. Margery's poor mother ſurvived the loſs of her huſband but a few days, and died of a broken heart, leaving Margery and her little brother to the wide world; but, poor woman, it would have melted your heart to have ſeen how frequently ſhe heaved up her head, while ſhe lay ſpeechleſs, to ſurvey with languiſhing looks her little orphans, as

as much as to say, Do Tommy, do Margery, come with me. They cried, poor things, and she sighed away her soul; and I hope is happy.

It would both have excited your pity and have done your heart good, to have seen how fond these two little ones were of each other, and how, hand in hand they trotted about, Pray see them.

They

They were both very ragged, and Tommy had two ſhoes, but Margery had but one. They had nothing, poor things to ſupport them (not being in their own pariſh) but what they picked from the hedges, or got from the poor people, and they lay every night in a barn. Their relations took no notice of them; no, they were rich, and aſhamed to own ſuch a poor little ragged girl as Margery, and ſuch a dirty little curl pated boy as Tommy. Our relations and friends ſeldom take notice of us when we are poor; but as we grow rich they grow fond. And this will always be the caſe, while people love money better than virtue, or better than they do God Almighty. But ſuch wicked folks, who love nothing but money, and are proud and deſpiſe the poor, never come to any good in the end, as we ſhall ſee by and by.

CHAP. II.

How and about Mr. Smith.

MR. Smith was a very worthy Clergyman, who lived in the pariſh where little Margery and Tommy Tommy were born; and having a relation come to ſee him, who was a charitable good man, he ſent for theſe children to him. The gentleman ordered little Margery a new pair of ſhoes, gave Mr. Smith ſome money to buy her clothes; and ſaid, he would take Tommy and make him a little ſailor; and accordingly had a jacket and trowſers made for him, in which he now appears. Pray look at him.

After

After ſome days the gentleman intended to go to London; and take little Tommy with him, of whom you will know more by and by, for we ſhall at a proper time preſent you with ſome part of his Hiſtory, his travels and adventures.

The parting between theſe two little children was very affecting. Tommy cried, and Magery cried, and they kiſſed each other an hundred times. At laſt Tommy thus wiped off her tears

with

with the end of his jacket, and bid her cry no more, for that he would come to her again, when he returned from ſea. However, as they were ſo very fond, the gentleman would not ſuffer them to take leave of each other; but told Tommy he ſhould ride out with him, and come back at night. When night came, little Margery grew very uneaſy about her brother, and after ſitting up as late as Mr. Smith would let her, ſhe went crying to bed.

CHAP. III.

How Little Margery obtained the name of Goody Twoſhoes, and what happened in the pariſh.

AS ſoon as Little Margery got up in the morning, which was very very early, ſhe ran all round the village, crying for her brother; and after ſome time returned greatly diſtreſſed. However, at this inſtant, the ſhoemaker very opportunely came in with the new ſhoes, for which ſhe had been meaſured by the gentleman's order.

Nothing could have ſupported Little Margery under the affliction ſhe was in for the loſs of her brother, but the pleaſure ſhe took in her two ſhoes. She ran out to Mrs. Smith as ſoon as they were put on, and ſtroking down her ragged apron thus, cried out, Two Shoes, Mamme, ſee two Shoes. And ſo ſhe behaved to all the people ſhe met, and by that means obtained the name of Goody Two-ſhoes, though her playmates called her Old Goody Twoſhoes.

cried

Little Margery was very happy in being with Mr. and Mrs. Smith, who were very charitable and good to her, and had agreed to breed her up with their their family; but as ſoon as that tyrant of the pariſh, that Graſpall, heard of her being there, he applied firſt to Mr. Smith, and threatened to reduce his tythes if he kept her; and after that he ſpoke to Sir Timothy, who ſent Mr. Smith a peremptory meſſage by his ſervant, that he ſhould ſend back Meanwell's girl to be kept by her relations, and not harbour her in the pariſh. This ſo diſtreſſed Mr. Smith that he ſhed tears, and cried, Lord have mercy on the poor!

The prayers of the righteous fly upwards, and reach unto the throne of heaven, as will be ſeen in the ſequel.

Mrs. Smith was alſo greatly concerned at being thus obliged to diſcard poor little Margery. She kiſſed her and cried;

as

as alſo did Mr. Smith, but they were obliged to ſend her away; for the people who had ruined her father, could at any time have ruined them.

CHAP.

CHAP. IV.

How Little Margery learned to read, and by degrees taught others.

LITTLE Margery saw how good and how wise Mr. Smith was, and concluded, that this was owing to his great learning, therefore she wanted of all things to learn to read. For this purpose she used to meet the little boys and girls as they came from school, borrow their books, and sit down and read until they returned:

By

By this means ſhe ſoon got more learning than any of her playmates, and laid the following ſcheme for inſtructing thoſe who were more ignorant than herſelf. She found, that only the following letters were required to ſpell all the words in the world: But as ſome of theſe letters are large and ſome ſmall, ſhe with her her knife cut out of several pieces of wood ten sets of each of these :

a b c d e f g h i j k l m n o p q r f s t u v w x y z.

And six sets of these :

A B C D E F G H I J K L M N O
P Q R S T U V W X Y Z.

And having got an old spelling-book, she made her companions set up all the words they wanted to spell, and after that she taught them to compose sentences. You know what a sentence is, my dear ; I will be good, is a sentence : And is made up, as you see, of several words,

The usual manner of spelling or carrying on the game, as they called it, it, was this. Suppoſe the word to be ſpelt was plum pudding (and who can ſuppoſe a better) the children were placed in a circle, and the firſt brought the letter p, the next l, the next u, the next m, and ſo on until the whole was ſpelt; and if any one brought a wrong letter, he was to pay a fine, or play no more. This was at their play; and every morning ſhe uſed to go round to teach the children with theſe rattle-traps in a baſket, as you ſee in the print.

I once

I once went her rounds with her, and was highly diverted, as you may be, if you pleaſe to look into the next chapter.

CHAP. V.

How Little Twoſhoes became a trotting Tutoreſs, and how ſhe taught her young pupils.

IT was about ſeven o'clock in the morning when we ſet out on this important important buſineſs, and the firſt houſe we came to was Farmer Wilſon's. See here it is.

Here Margery ſtopped, and ran up to the door, tap, tap, tap. Who's there? Only little Goody Twoſhoes, anſwered Margery, come to teach Billy. Oh! little Goody, ſays Mrs. Wilſon, with pleaſure in her face, I am glad to ſee you. Billy wants you

you ſadly, for he has learned all his leſſon. Then out came the little boy. How do, doody Twoſhoes, ſays he, not able to ſpeak plain. Yet this little boy had learned all his letters; for ſhe threw down this alphabet mixed together thus:

b d f h k m o q s u w y z ſ
a c e g i l n p r t v x j

and he picked them up, called them by their right names, and put them all in order thus:

a b c d e f g h i j k l m n o
p q r ſ s t u v w x y z.

She then threw down the alphabet of capital letters in the manner you here ſee them;

B D F H K M O Q S U W Y Z
A C E G I L N P R T V X J.

and he picked them all up, and having told their names, placed them thus:

A B C D E F G H I J K L M N O
P Q R S T U V W X Y Z.

Now, pray, little reader, take this bodkin, and ſee if you can point out the letters from theſe mixed Alphabets, and tell how they ſhould be placed as well as little boy Billy.

The next place we came to was Farmer Simpſon's, and here it is.

Bow, wow, wow, ſays the dog at the door. Sirrah, ſays his Miſtreſs, what do you bark at Little Two-ſhoes? Come in, Madge; here, Sally wants you ſadly, ſhe has learned all her leſſon. Then out came the little one; So Madge! ſays ſhe; So Sally! anſwered the other, have you learned your leſſon? Yes, that's what I have, replied the little one in the the country manner ; and immediately taking the letters ſhe ſet up theſe ſyllables :

ba be bi bo bu, ca ce ci co cu da de di do du, fa fe fi fo fu and gave them their exact ſounds as ſhe compoſed them ; after which ſhe ſet up the following :

ac ec ic oc uc, ad ed id od ud af ef if of uf, ag eg ig og ug

And pronounced them likewiſe. She then ſung the Cuzz's Chorus (which may be found in the Little Pretty Play Thing, publiſhed by Mr. THOMAS) and to the ſame tune to which it is there ſet.

After this, Little Twoſhoes taught her to ſpell words of one Syllable, and and she soon set up pear, plumb, top, ball, pin, puss, dog, hog, fawn, buck, doe, lamb, sheep, ram, cow, bull, cock, hen, and many more.

The next place we came to was Gaffer Cook's cottage; there you see it before you.

Here a number of poor children were met to learn; who all came round round little Margery at once; and, having pulled out her letters, ſhe aſked the little boy next her, what he had for dinner? Who anſwered, Bread, (the poor children in many places live very hard.) Well, then, ſays ſhe, ſet the firſt letter. He put up the letter B, to which the next added r, and the next e, the next a, the next d, and it ſtood thus, Bread.

And what had you, Polly Comb, for your dinner? Apple Pye, anſwered the little girl: Upon which the next in turn ſet up a great A, the two next a p each, and ſo on until the two words Apple and Pye were united and ſtood thus, Apple-pye.

The next had Potatoes, the next Beef and Turnips, which were ſpelt, with many others, until the game of of ſpelling was finiſhed. She then ſet them another taſk, and we proceeded.

The next place we came to was Farmer Thompſon's, where there were a great many little ones waiting for her.

So, little Mrs. Goody Twoſhoes, ſays one of them, where have you been ſo long? I have been teaching, ſays ſhe longer than I intended, and am afraid I am come too ſoon for you now. No, but indeed you are not, replied the other; for I have got my leſſon, and ſo has Sally Dawſon, and ſo has Harry Wilſon, and ſo we have all; and they capered about as if they were overjoyed to ſee her. Why then, ſays ſhe, you are all very good, and God Almighty will love you; ſo let us begin our leſſons. They all huddled round her, her, and though at the other place they were employed about words and ſyllables, here we had people of much greater underſtanding, who dealt only in ſentences.

The letters being brought upon the table, one of the little ones ſet up the following ſentence:

The Lord have mercy upon me, and grant that I may be always good, and ſay my prayers, and love the Lord my God with all my heart, with all my ſoul, and with all my ſtrength; and honour government, and all good men in authority.

Then the next took the letters, and compoſed this ſentence:

Lord have mercy upon me, and grant that I may love my neighbour as myſelf, and do unto all men as I would have them do unto me, and tell no lies; but be honeſt and juſt in all my dealings.

The

The third composed the following sentence:

The Lord have mercy upon me, and grant that I may honour my father and mother, and love my brothers and sisters, relations and friends, and all my playmates, and every body, and endeavour to make them happy.

The fourth composed the following:

I pray God to bless this whole company, and all our friends and all our enemies.

To the last Polly Sullen objected, and said, truly, she did not know why she should pray for our enemies? Not pray for your enemies, says Little Margery; yes, you must, you are no Christian, if you don't forgive your enemies, and do good for evil. Polly still pouted; upon which Little Margery said, though she was poor

poor, and obliged to live in a barn, ſhe would not keep company with ſuch a naughty, proud, perverſe girl as Polly; and was going away; however the difference was made up, and ſhe ſet them to compoſe the following

LESSONS

For the CONDUCT of LIFE.

LESSON I.

He that will thrive,
Muſt riſe by five.
He that hath thriv'n,
May lay till ſeven.
Truth may be blam'd,
But can't be ſham'd.
Tell me with whom you go,
And I'll tell what you do.

A friend in your need,
Is a friend indeed.
They never can be wiſe,
Who good counſel deſpiſe.

LESSON II.

A wiſe head makes a cloſe mouth.
Don't burn your lips with another man's broth.
Wit is folly, unleſs a wiſe man hath the keeping of it.
Uſe ſoft words and hard arguments.
Honey catches more flies than vinegar.
To forget a wrong is the beſt revenge.
Patience is a plaiſter for all ſores.
Where pride goes, ſhame will follow.
When vice enters the room, vengeance is near the door.

Induſtry

Induſtry is fortune's right hand, and frugality her left.
Make much of Three pence, or you ne'er will be worth a groat.

Lesson III.

A lie ſtands upon one leg, but truth upon two.
When a man talks much, believe but half what he ſays.
Fair words butter no parſnips.
Bad company poiſons the mind.
A covetous man is never ſatisfied.
Abundance, like want, ruins many.
Contentment is the beſt fortune.
A contented mind is a continual feaſt.

A Lesson in Religion.

Love God, for he is good.
Fear God, for he is juſt.

Pray

Pray to God, for all good things come from him.

Praiſe God, for great is his mercy towards us, and wonderful are all his works.

Thoſe who ſtrive to be good, have God on their ſide.

Thoſe who have God for their friend ſhall want nothing.

Confeſs your ſins to God, and if you repent he will forgive you.

Remember that all you do, is done in the preſence of God.

The time will come, my friends, when we muſt give Account to God, how we on earth did live.

A Moral LESSON.

A good boy will make a good man.

Honour your parents, and the world will honour you.

Love

Love your friends, and your friends will love you.

He that ſwims in ſin, will ſink in ſorrow.

Learn to live as you would wiſh to die.

As you expect all men ſhould deal by you;
So deal by them, and give each man his due.

As we were returning home, we ſaw a gentleman, who was very ill, ſitting under a ſhady tree at the corner of his rookery. Though ill, he began to joke with Little Margery, and ſaid, laughing, So, Goody Two-ſhoes, they tell me you are a cunning little baggage; pray, can you tell me what I ſhall do to get well? Yes, Sir, ſays ſhe, go to bed when your your rooks do. You ſee they are going to reſt already.

Do you ſo likewiſe, and get up with them in the morning; earn, as they do, every day what you eat, and eat and drink no more than you earn; and you'll get health and keep it. What ſhould induce the rooks to frequent gentlemen's houſes only, but to tell them how to lead a prudent dent life? They never build over cottages or farm houſes, becauſe they ſee, that theſe people know how to live without their admonition.

Thus health and wit you may improve,
Taught by the tenants of the grove.

The gentleman laughing gave Margery ſixpence, and told her ſhe was a ſenſible huſſey.

CHAP. VI.

How the whole Pariſh was frightened.

WHO does not know Lady Ducklington, or who does not know that ſhe was buried at this pariſh church?

Well,

Well, I never ſaw ſo grand a funeral in all my life; but the money they ſquandered away, would have been better laid out in little books for children, or in meat, drink, and clothes for the poor.

This is a fine hearſe indeed, and the nodding plumes on the horſes look

look very grand ; but what end does that anſwer, otherwiſe than to diſplay the pride of the living, or the vanity of the dead. Fie upon ſuch folly, ſay I, and heaven grant that thoſe who want more ſenſe may have it.

But all the country round came to ſee the burying, and it was late before the corpſe was interred. After which, in the night, or rather about four o'clock in the morning, the bells were heard to jingle in the ſteeple, which frightened the people prodigiouſly, who all thought it was Lady Ducklington's ghoſt dancing among the bell ropes. The people flocked to Will Dobbins the Clerk, and wanted him to go and ſee what it was; but William ſaid he was ſure it was a ghoſt, and that he would not offer to open the door. At length Mr. Long, the rector, hearing ſuch an uproar, in the village, went to the clerk to know why he did not go into the church, and ſee who was there. I go, Sir, ſays William, why the ghoſt would frighten me out of my wits.——Mrs. Dobbins too cried, and laying hold on her huſband ſaid, he ſhould not be eat up by the ghoſt. A ghoſt, you blockheads, ſays Mr. Long Long in a pet, did either of you ever ſee a ghoſt, or know any body that did? Yes, ſays the Clerk, my father did once in the ſhape of a windmill, and it walked all round the church in a white ſheet, with jack boots on, and had a gun by its ſide inſtead of a ſword. A fine picture of a ghoſt truly, ſays Mr. Long, give me the key of the church, you monkey; for I tell you there is no ſuch thing now, whatever may have been formerly.——Then taking the key he went to the church, all the people following him. As ſoon as he had opened the door, what ſort of a ghoſt do you think appeared? Why Little Twoſhoes, who being weary, had fallen aſleep in one of the pews during the funeral ſervice, and was ſhut in all night. She immediately aſked Mr. Long's pardon for the trouble

trouble ſhe had given him, told him, ſhe had been locked into the church, and ſaid, ſhe ſhould not have rung the bells, but that ſhe was very cold, and hearing Farmer Boult's man go whiſtling by with his horſes, ſhe was in hopes he would have went to the Clerk for the key to let her out.

CHAP.

CHAP. VII.

Containing an account of all the ſpirits, or ghoſts, ſhe ſaw in the church.

THE people were aſhamed to aſk Little Madge any queſtions before Mr. Long, but as ſoon as he was gone, they all got round her to ſatisfy their curioſity, and deſired ſhe would give them a particular account of all that ſhe had heard and ſeen.

Her TALE.

I went to the church, ſaid ſhe, as moſt of you did laſt night, to ſee the burying, and being very weary, I ſat me down in Mr. Jones's pew, and and fell faſt aſleep, At eleven of the clock I awoke; which I believe was in ſome meaſure occaſioned by the clock's ſtriking, for I heard it. I ſtarted up, and could not at firſt tell where I was; but after ſome time I recollected the funeral, and ſoon found that I was ſhut in the church. It was diſmal dark, and I could ſee nothing; but while I was ſtanding in the pew, ſomething jumped up upon me behind, and laid, as I thought, its hands over my ſhoulders.——I own, I was a little afraid at firſt; however, I conſidered that I had always been conſtant at prayers and at church, and that I had done nobody any harm, but had endeavoured to do what good I could; and then, thought I, what have I to fear; yet I kneeled down to ſay my prayers. As ſoon as I was on my knees, ſomething thing very cold, as cold as marble, ay, as cold as ice, touched my neck, which made me ſtart; however, I continued my prayers, and having begged protection from Almighty God, I found my ſpirits come, and I was ſenſible that I had nothing to fear; for God Almighty protects not only all thoſe that are good, but alſo all thoſe who endeavour to be good.—Nothing can withſtand the power, and exceed the goodneſs of God Almighty. Armed with the confidence of his protection, I walked down the church iſle, when I heard ſomething pit pat, pit pat, pit pat, come after me, and ſomething touched my hand, which ſeemed as cold as a marble monument. I could not think what this was, yet I knew it could not hurt me, and therefore I made myſelf eaſy, but being very cold, and the church being paved with ſtones, which was very damp, I felt my way as well as I could to the pulpit, in doing which ſomething bruſhed by me, and almoſt threw me down. However I was not frightened, for I knew that God Almighty would ſuffer nothing to hurt me.

the

At laſt I found out the pulpit, and having ſhut the door, I laid me down on the mat and cuſhion to ſleep; when ſomething thruſt and pulled the door, as I thought for admittance, which prevented my going to ſleep. At laſt it cries, Bow, wow, wow; and I concluded it muſt be Mr. Saunderſon's dog, which had followed me from their houſe to church; ſo I opened the door, and called Snip, Snip, and the dog jumped upon me immediately. After this, Snip and I lay down together, and had a moſt comfortable nap; for when I awoke again it was almoſt light. I then walked up and down all the iſles of the church to keep myſelf warm; and though I went into the vaults, and trod on Lady Ducklington's coffin, I ſaw no ghoſt, and I believe it was owing to the reaſon Mr. Long has given you, namely, that there is no ſuch thing to be ſeen. As to my part, I would as ſoon lie all night in the church as in any other place; and I am ſure that any little boy or girl, who is good and loves God Almighty, and keeps his commandments, may as ſafely lie in the church, or the church yard, as any where elſe, if they take care not to get cold, for I am ſure there are no ghoſts, either to hurt or frighten them; though any one poſſeſſed of fear might

and

might have taken neighbour Saunderſon's dog with his cold noſe for a ghoſt; and if they had not been undeceived, as I was, would never have thought otherwiſe. All the company acknowledged the juſtneſs of the obſervation, and thanked Little Twoſhoes for her advice.

REFLECTION.

After this, my dear Children, I hope you will not believe any fooliſh ſtories that ignorant, weak, or deſigning people may tell you about ghoſts; for the tales of ghoſts, witches and fairies, are the frolicks of a diſtempered brain. No wiſe man ever ſaw either of them. Little Margery you ſee was not afraid; no, ſhe had good ſenſe, and a good conſcience, which is a cure for all theſe imaginary evils.

CHAP. VIII.

Of ſomething which happened to Little Twoſhoes in a barn, more dreadful than the ghoſt in the church; and how ſhe returned good for evil to her enemy Sir Timothy.

SOME days after this, a more dreadful accident befel Little Madge. She happened to be coming late from teaching, when it rained, thundered and lightened, and therefore ſhe took ſhelter in a Farmer's barn,

at

at a diſtance from the village. Soon after the tempeſt drove in four thieves, who, not ſeeing ſuch a little creepmouſe girl as Twoſhoes, lay down on the hay next to her, and began to talk over their exploits, and to ſettle plans for future robberies. Little Margery on hearing them, covered herſelf with ſtraw. To be ſure ſhe was ſadly frightened, but her good

ſenſe

ſenſe taught her, that the only ſecurity ſhe had, was in keeping herſelf concealed; therefore ſhe laid very ſtill and breathed very ſoftly. About four o'clock theſe wicked people came to a reſolution to break both Sir William Dove's houſe, and Sir Timothy Gripe's, and by force of arms to carry off all their money, plate, and jewels; but as it was thought then too late, they agreed to defer it until the next night. After laying this ſcheme, they all ſet out upon their pranks, which greatly rejoiced Margery, as it would any other little girl in her ſituation. Early in the morning ſhe went to Sir William, and told him the whole of their converſation. Upon which, he aſked her name, gave her ſomething, and bid her call at his houſe the day following. She alſo went to Sir Timothy, notwithſtanding ſtanding he had uſed her ſo ill; for ſhe knew it was her duty to do good for evil. As ſoon as he was informed who ſhe was, he took no notice of her; upon which ſhe deſired to ſpeak to Lady Gripe, and having informed her Ladyſhip of the affair, ſhe went her way. This lady had more ſenſe than her huſband, which indeed is not a ſingular caſe; for inſtead of deſpiſing Little Margery and her information, ſhe privately ſet people to guard the houſe. The robbers divided themſelves, and went about the time mentioned to both houſes, and were ſurprized by the guards, and taken. Upon examining theſe wretches, one of which turned evidence, both Sir William and Sir Timothy found that they owed their lives to the diſcovery made by Little Margery; and the firſt took great great notice of her, and would no longer let her lie in a barn; but Sir Timothy only ſaid, that he was aſhamed to owe his life to the daughter of one who was his enemy; ſo true it is, that a proud man ſeldom forgives thoſe he has injured.

CHAP. IX.

How Little Margery was made Principal of a Country College.

MRS. Williams, of whom I have given a particular account in my New Year's Gift, and who kept a College for inſtructing little gentlemen and ladies in the ſcience of A, B, C, was at this time very old and infirm, and wanted to decline this important truſt. This being told to Sir William Dove, who lived in in the parish, he sent for Mrs. Williams, and desired she would examine Little Twoshoes, and see whether she was qualified for the office.—— This was done, and Mrs. Williams made the following report in her favour, namely, that Little Margery was the best scholar, and had the best head, and the best heart, of any one she had examined. All the country had a great opinion of Mrs. Williams, and this character gave them also a good opinion of Mrs. Margery; for so we must now call her.

This Mrs. Margery thought the happiest period of her life; but more happiness was in store for her, God Almighty heaps up blessings for all those who love him, and though for a time he may suffer them to be poor and distressed, and hide his good purposes from human sight, yet in the the end they are generally crowned with happineſs here, and no one can doubt of their being ſo hereafter.

On this occaſion the following Hymn, or rather a tranſlation of the twenty third Pſalm, is ſaid to have been written, and was ſoon after publiſhed in the Spectator.

I.

The Lord my paſture ſhall prepare,
And feed me with a ſhepherd's care;
His preſence ſhall my wants ſupply,
And guard me with a watchful eye;
My noonday walks he ſhall attend,
And all my midnight hours defend.

II.

When in the ſultry glebe I faint,
Or to the thirſty mountain pant;
To fertile vales and dewy meads,
My weary wandering ſteps he leads;
Where peaceful rivers, ſoft and ſlow,
Amid the verdant landſkip flow.

III.

Tho' in the paths of death I tread,
With gloomy horrours overspread,
My stedfast heart shall fear no ill,
For thou, O Lord, art with me still;
Thy friendly crook shall give me aid,
And guide me thro' the dreadful shade.

IV.

Tho' in a bare and rugged way.
Thro' devious lonely wilds I stray,
Thy bounty shall my pains beguile;
The barren wilderness shall smile,
With sudden greens and herbage, crown'd.
And streams shall murmur all around.

Here ends the History of Little Twoshoes. Those who would know how she behaved after she came to be Mrs. Margery Twoshoes must read the second part of this work, in which an account of the remainder of her life, her marriage and death are set forth at large.

THE RENOWNED

HISTORY

OF

MRS. MARGERY TWOSHOES.

PART II.

INTRODUCTION.

IN the firſt part of this work, the young ſtudent has read, and I hope with pleaſure and improvement, the hiſtory of this lady, while ſhe was known and diſtinguiſhed by the name of little Twoſhoes; we are now come to a period of her life when that name was diſcarded, and a more eminent one beſtowed upon her, her, I mean that of Mrs. Margery Twoſhoes: For as ſhe was now preſident of the A, B, C, College, it became neceſſary to exalt her in title as well as in place.

No ſooner was ſhe ſettled in this office, but ſhe laid every poſſible ſcheme to promote the welfare and happineſs of all her neighbours, and eſpecially of her little ones, in whom ſhe took great delight; and all thoſe whoſe parents could not afford to pay for their education, ſhe taught for nothing, but the pleaſure ſhe had in their company; for you are to obſerve, that they were very good, or were ſoon made ſo by her good management.

CHAP. I.

Of her School, her Ushers, or Assistants, and her Manner of Teaching.

WE have already informed the reader, that the school where she taught, was that which was before kept by Mrs. Williams, whose character you may find in my New Year's Gift. The room was large, and as she knew that nature intended children should be always in action, she placed her different letters, or alphabets, all round the school, so that every one was obliged to get up and fetch a letter, or to spell a word when it came to their turn; which not only kept them in health, but fixed the letters and points firmly in their minds.

She

She had the following assistants or ushers to help her, and I will tell you how she came by them. Mrs. Margery, you must know, was very humane and compassionate; and her tenderness extended not only to all mankind, but even to all animals that were not noxious; as your's ought to do, if you would be happy here, and go to heaven hereafter. These are God Almighty's creatures as well as we. He made both them and us; and for wise purposes, best known to himself, placed them in this world to live among us; so that they are our fellow tenants of the globe. How then can people dare to torture and wantonly destroy God Almighty's creatures? They, as well as you, are capable of feeling pain, and of receiving pleasure, and how can you, who want to be made happy py yourſelf, delight in making your fellow creatures miſerable? Do you think the poor birds, whoſe neſt and young ones that wicked boy Dick Wilſon ran away with yeſterday, do not feel as much pain as your father and mother would have felt, had any one pulled down their houſe and ran away with you? To be ſure they do. Mrs. Twoſhoes uſed to ſpeak of thoſe things, and of naughty boy's throwing at cocks, torturing flies, and whipping horſes and dogs, with tears in her eyes, and would never ſuffer any one to come to her ſchool who did ſo.

One day, as ſhe was going through the next village, ſhe met with ſome wicked boys, who had got a young raven, which they were going to throw at; ſhe wanted to get the poor creature out of their cruel hands, and and therefore gave them a penny for him, and brought him home. She called his name Ralph, and a fine bird he is. Do look at him, and remember what Solomon says, the eye that despiseth his father, and regardeth not the distress of his mother, the ravens of the valley shall peck it out, and the young eagles eat it. Now this bird she taught to speak, to spell and to read; and as he was particularly ularly fond of playing with the large letters, the children uſed to call this Ralph's alphabet.

A B C D E F G H I J K L M N O
P Q R S T U V W X Y Z.

He always ſat at her elbow, as you ſee in the firſt picture, and when any of the children were wrong, ſhe uſed to call out, Put them right Ralph.

Some days after ſhe had met with the raven, as ſhe was walking in the fields, ſhe ſaw ſome naughty boys, who had taken a pigeon, and tied a ſtring to its leg, in order to let it fly, and draw it back again when they pleaſed; and by this means they tortured the poor animal with the hopes of liberty and repeated diſappointment. This pigeon ſhe alſo bought, and taught him how to ſpell and read, though not to talk, and he performed all thoſe extraordinary things.

things which are recorded of the famous bird, that was ſome time ſince advertiſed in the Newſpaper, and viſited by moſt of the great people in the country. This pigeon was a very pretty fellow, and ſhe called him Tom. See here he is.

And as the raven Ralph was fond of the large letters, Tom the pigeon took care of the ſmall ones, of which he compoſed this alphabet.

a b c d e f g h i j k l m n o
p q r ſ s t u v w x y z.

The neighbours knowing that Mrs. Twoſhoes was very good, as to be ſure nobody was better, made her a preſent of a little ſky lark, and a fine bird he is. See him and an L with him.

Now

Now as many people, even at that time, had learned to lie in bed long in the morning, ſhe thought the lark might be of uſe to her and her pupils, and tell them when to get up.

For he that is fond of his bed, and lays till noon, lives but half his days, the reſt being loſt in ſleep, which is a kind of death.

Some time after this a poor lamb had loſt its dam, and the farmer being about to kill it, ſhe bought it of him, and brought it home with her to play with the children, and teach them when to go to bed: for it was a rule with the wiſe men of that age (and a very good one, let me tell you) to

Riſe

Rise with the lark and lie down with the lamb.

This lamb she called Will, and a pretty fellow he is; do look at him.

No sooner was Tippy the lark and Will the Balamb brought into the school, but that sensible rogue Ralph, the raven, composed the follow-following verſe, which every little good boy and girl ſhould get by heart.

Early to bed, and early to riſe,
Is the way to be healthy, and wealthy and wiſe.

A ſly rogue; but it is true enough; for thoſe who do not go to bed early cannot riſe early: and thoſe who do not riſe early, cannot do much buſineſs. Pray let this be told at the court, and to the people who have routes and rackets.

Soon after this, a preſent was made to Mrs. Margery of a little dog Jumper, and a pretty dog he is. Pray look at him.

Jumper,

Jumper, Jumper, Jumper! He is always in a good humour, and playing and jumping about, and therefore he was called Jumper. The place assigned for Jumper, was that of keeping the door, so that he may be called the porter of a college, for he would let nobody go out, or any one come in, without leave of his mistress. See how he looks, a saucy rogue.

Billy

Billy the Balamb was a cheerful fellow, and all the children were fond of him, wherefore Mrs. Twoſhoes made it a rule, that thoſe who behaved beſt ſhould have Will to go home with them at night to carry their ſatchels or baſkets at his back, and bring them in the morning. See what a fine fellow he is, and how he trudges along.

CHAP. II.

A Scene of Diſtreſs in a School.

IT happened one day, when Mrs. Twoſhoes was diverting the children after dinner, as ſhe uſually did with ſome innocent games, or entertaining and inſtructive ſtories, that a man arrived with the melancholy news of Sally Jones's father being thrown thrown from his horſe, and thought paſt all recovery; nay, the meſſenger, ſaid, that he was ſeemingly dying when he came away. Poor Sally was greatly diſtreſſed, as indeed were all in the ſchool, for ſhe dearly loved her father, and Mrs. Two-Shoes, and all the children dearly loved her. It is generally ſaid, that we never know the real value of our parents or friends until we have loſt them; but poor Sally felt this by affection, and her miſtreſs knew it by experience. All the ſchool were in tears, and the meſſenger was obliged to return; but before he went, Mrs. Twoſhoes, unknown to the children, ordered Tom pigeon to go home with the man, and bring a letter to inform her how Mr. Jones did. They ſet out together, and the pigeon rode on the man's head, (as you see here) for the man was able to carry the pigeon, though the pigeon was not able to carry the man; if he had, they would have been there much sooner, for Tom pigeon was very good and never staid of an errand.

Soon after the man was gone, the pigeon pigeon was loſt, and the concern the children were under for Mr. Jones and little Sally was in ſome meaſure diverted, and part of their attention turned after Tom, who was a great favourite, and conſequently much bewailled. Mrs. Margery, who knew the great uſe and neceſſity of teaching children to ſubmit cheerfully to the will of providence, bid them wipe away their tears, and then kiſſing Sally, You muſt be a good girl ſays ſhe, and depend upon God Almighty for his bleſſing and protection; for he is a father to the fatherleſs, and defendeth all thoſe who put their truſt in him. She then told them a ſtory, which I ſhall relate in as few words as poſſible.

The

The History of Mr. Lovewell, Father to Lady Lucy.

Mr. Lovewell was born at Bath, and apprenticed to a laborious trade in London, which being too hard for him, he parted with his master by consent, and hired himself as a common servant to a merchant in the city. Here he spent his leisure hours, not as servants too frequently do, in drinking and schemes of pleasure, but in improving his mind; and among other acquirements he made himself a complete master of accompts. His sobriety, honesty, and the regard he paid to his master's interest, greatly recommended him in the whole family, and he had several offices of trust committed to his charge, in which he acquitted acquitted himſelf ſo well, that the merchant removed him from the ſtable to the counting houſe.

Here he ſoon made himſelf maſter of the buſineſs, and became ſo uſeful to the merchant, that in regard to his faithful ſervices, and the affection he had for him, he married him to his own niece, a prudent agreeable young lady; and gave him a ſhare in the buſineſs. See what honeſty and induſtry will do for us. Half the great men in London, I am told, have made themſelves by this means; and who would but be honeſt and induſtrious, when it is ſo much our intereſt and our duty.

After ſome years the merchant died, and left Mr. Lovewell poſſeſſed of many fine ſhips at ſea, and much money, and he was happy in a wife, who had brought him a ſon and two daughdaughters, all dutiful and obedient. The treasures and good things, however, of this life are so uncertain, that a man can never be happy, unless he lays the foundation for it in his own mind. So true is that copy in our writing book, which tells us, that a contented mind is a continual feast.

After some years successful trade, he thought his circumstances sufficient to insure his own ships, or, in other words, to send his ships and goods to sea without being insured by others, as is customary among merchants; when, unfortunately for him, four of them richly laden were lost at sea. This he supported with becoming resolution; but the next mail brought him advice, that nine others were taken by the French, with whom we were then at war; and this togeth-

together with the failure of three foreign merchants whom he had trusted, completed his ruin. He was then obliged to call his creditors, together who took his effects, and being angry with him for the imprudent step of not insuring his ships, left him destitute of all subsistence. Nor did the flatterers of his fortune, those who had lived by his bounty, when in his prosperity, pay the least regard either to him or his family. So true is another copy, that you will find in your writing book; which says, misfortune tries our friends. All those slights of his pretended friends, and the ill usage of his creditors, both he and his family bore with christian fortitude: But other calamities fell upon him which he felt more sensibly.

In this distress one of his relations, tions, who lived at Florence, offered to take his ſon, and another, who lived at Barbadoes, ſent for one of his daughters. The ſhip which his ſon ſailed in was caſt away, and all the crew ſuppoſed to be loſt; and the ſhip in which his daughter went a paſſenger, was taken by pirates, and one poſt brought the miſerable father an account of the loſs of his two children. This was the ſevereſt ſtroke of all, it made him completely wretched, and he knew it muſt have a dreadful effect on his wife and daughter; he therefore endeavoured to conceal it from them. But the perpetual anxiety he was in, together with the loſs of his appetite and want of reſt, ſoon alarmed his wife. She found ſomething was labouring n his breaſt, which was concealed om her; and one night being disturbed in a dream, with what was ever in his thoughts, and calling out upon his dear children; she awoke him, and insisted upon knowing the cause of his inquietude. Nothing, my dear, nothing, says he, The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord. This was sufficient to alarm the poor woman; she lay until his spirits were composed, and as she thought asleep, then stealing out of bed got the keys and opened his bureau, where she found the fatal account. In the height of her distractions, she flew to her daughter's room and waking her with her shrieks, put the letters into her hands. The young lady unable to support the load of misery, fell into a fit from which it was thought she never could have been recovered.

diſturbed

How-

However, at last she revived; but the shock was so great, that it entirely deprived her of her speech.

Thus, loaded with misery, and unable to bear the slights and disdains of those who had formerly professed themselves friends, this unhappy family retired into a country, where they were unknown, in order to hide themselves from the world, when, to support their independency, the father laboured as well as he could at husbandry, and the mother and daughter sometimes got spinning and knitting work, to help to furnish the means of subsistence; which however was so precarious and uncertain, that they often, for many weeks together, lived on nothing but cabbage and bread boiled in water. But God never forsaketh the righteous, nor suffereth those to perish perish who put their trust in him. At this time a lady, who was just come to England, sent to take a pleasant seat ready furnished in that neighbourhood, and the person who was employed for the purpose, was ordered to deliver a bank note of an hundred pounds to Mr. Lovewell, another hundred to his wife, and a fifty to the daughter, desiring them to take possession of the house and get it well aired against she came down, which would be in two or three days at most. This to people who were almost starving, was a sweet and seasonable relief, and they were solicitous to know their benefactress, but of that the messenger himself was too ignorant to inform them. However, she came down sooner than was expected, and with tears embraced them again and again: After which ſhe told the father and mother ſhe had heard from their daughter, who was her acquaintance, and that ſhe was well, and on her return to England. This was the agreeable ſubject of their converſation, until after dinner, when drinking their healths, ſhe again with tears ſaluted them and falling upon her knees aſked their bleſſings.

again;

It is impoſſible to expreſs the mutual joy joy which this occaſioned. Their converſation was made up of the moſt endearing expreſſions, intermingled with tears and careſſes. Their torrent of joy, however, was for a moment interrupted, by a chariot which ſtopped at the gate, and which brought as they thought a very unſeaſonable viſitor, and therefore ſhe ſent to be excuſed from ſeeing company.

But

But this had no effect, for a gentleman richly dressed, jumped out of the chariot, and pursuing the servant into the parlour, saluted them round, who were all astonished at this behaviour. But when the tears trickled from his cheeks, the daughter, who had been some years dumb, immediately cried out, My brother! my brother! my brother! and from that instant recovered her speech. The mutual joy which this occasioned, is better felt than expressed. Those who have proper sentiments of humanity, gratitude, and filial piety, will rejoice at the event; and those who have a proper idea of the goodness of God, and his gracious providence, will from this, as well as other instances of his goodness and mercy, glorify his holy name and magnify his wisdom and power, who is a shield

ſhield to the righteous, and defendeth all thoſe who put their truſt in him.

As you my dear children, may be ſolicitous to know how this happy event was brought about, I muſt inform you, that Mr. Lovewell's ſon, when the ſhip foundered, had, with ſome others got into the long boat, and was taken up by a ſhip at ſea, and carried to the Eaſt Indies, where in a little time he made a large fortune; and the pirates who took his daughter, attempted to rob her of her chaſtity; but finding her inflexible, and determined to die rather than to ſubmit, ſome of them behaved to her in a very cruel manner; but others, who had more honour and generoſity, became her defendants; upon which a quarrel aroſe between them, and the captain, who was the worſt of

of the gang, being killed, the rest of the crew carried the ship into a port of the Manilla islands, belonging to the Spaniards; where, when her story was known, she was treated with great respect, and courted by a young gentleman, who was taken ill of a fever, and died before the marriage was agreed on, but left her his whole fortune.

You see, my dear Sally, how wonderfully, these people were preserved, and made happy after such extreme distress; we are therefore never, to despair, even under the greatest misfortunes, for God Almighty is all-powerful, and can deliver us at any time. Remember Job, but I think you have not read so far; take the Bible Billy Jones, and read the history of that good and patient man. At this instant something was heard to flap at the window. Wow, wow, wow, ſays Jumper, and attempted to leap up and open the door, at which the children were ſurprized; but Mrs. Margery knowing what it was, opened the caſement, as Noah did the window of the ark, and drew in Tom pigeon with a letter, and ſee here it is.

to

As ſoon as he was placed upon the table, he walked up to little Sally,

and

and dropping the letter, cried Cô, Co, Coo; as much as to say, there read it. Now this poor pigeon had travelled fifty miles in about an hour, to bring Sally this letter, and who would destroy such pretty creatures. ——But let us read the letter.

My dear Sally,

God Almighty has been very merciful, and restored your papa to us again, who is now so well as to be able to sit up. I hear you are a good girl, my dear, and I hope you will never forget to praise the Lord for this his great goodness and mercy to us.——What a sad thing it would have been if your father had died, and left both you and me, and little Tommy in distress, and without a friend: Your father sends his blessing

ſing with mine.—Be good, my dear child, and GOD Almighty will alſo bleſs you, whoſe bleſſing is above all things.

I am, my dear Sally,

Your ever affectionate Mother,

MARTHA JONES.

CHAP. III.

Of the amazing Sagacity and Inſtinct of a little Dog.

SOON after this, a dreadful accident happened in the ſchool. It was on a Thurſday morning, I very well remember, when the children having learned their leſſons ſoon, ſhe had given them leave to play, play, and they were all running about the ſchool, and diverting themſelves with the birds and the lamb; at this time the dog, all of a ſudden, laid hold of his miſtreſs's apron, and endeavoured to pull her out of the ſchool. She was at firſt ſurprized; however, ſhe followed him to ſee what he intended. No ſooner had he led her into the garden, but he ran back, and pulled out one of the children in the ſame manner; upon which ſhe ordered them all to leave the ſchool immediately, and they had not been out five minutes, before the top of the houſe fell in. What a miraculous deliverance was here! How gracious! How good was God Almighty to ſave all theſe children from deſtruction, and to make uſe of ſuch an inſtrument, as a little ſagacious animal, to accompliſh his his divine will. I ſhould have obſerved that as ſoon as they were all in the garden, the dog came leaping round them to expreſs his joy, and when the houſe was fallen, laid himſelf down quietly by his miſtreſs.

Some of the neighbours who ſaw the ſchool fall, and who were in great pain for Margery and the little ones, ſoon ſpread the news through the village, and all the parents, terrified for their children, came crowding in abundance; they had, however, the ſatisfaction to find them all ſafe, and upon their knees, with their miſtreſs, giving GOD thanks for their happy deliverance.

ADVICE from the MAN in the MOON.

Jumper, Jumper, Jumper, what a pretty dog he is, and how ſenſible?

Had

Had mankind half the ſagacity of Jumper, they would guard againſt accidents of this ſort, by having a publick ſurvey occaſionally made of all the houſes in every pariſh (eſpecially of thoſe, which are old and decayed) and not ſuffer them to remain in a crazy ſtate, until they fall down on the heads of the poor inhabitants, and cruſh them to death. Why, it was but yeſterday, that a whole houſe fell down in Gracechurch ſtreet, and another in Queen ſtreet, and an hundred more are to tumble before this time twelve months; ſo friends take care of yourſelves, and tell the legiſlature, they ought to take care for you. How can you be ſo careleſs? Moſt of your evils ariſe from careleſſneſs aud extravagance, and yet you excuſe yourſelves, and lay the fault upon upon fortune. Fortune is a fool, and you are a blockhead, if you put it in her power to play tricks with you.

Yours,

The MAN in the MOON.

You are not to wonder, my dear reader, that this little dog ſhould have more ſenſe than you, or your father, or your grandfather.

Though GOD Almighty has made man the lord of the creation, and endowed him with reaſon, yet in many reſpects, he has been altogether as bountiful to other creatures of his forming. Some of the ſenſes of other animals are more acute than ours, as we find by daily experience. You know this little bird, ſweet

ſweet Jug, Jug, Jug, 'tis a nightingale. This little creature, after ſhe has entertained us with her ſongs all the ſpring, and bred up her little ones, flies into a foreign country, and finds her way over the great ſea, without any of the inſtruments and helps which men are obliged to make uſe of for that purpoſe. Was you as wiſe as the nightingale, you you might make all the ſailors happy, and have twenty thouſand pounds for teaching them the longitude.

You would not think Ralph the raven half ſo wiſe and ſo good as he is, though you ſee him here reading his book. Yet when the prophet Elijah was obliged to fly from Ahab, king of Iſrael, and hide himſelf in a cave, the ravens, at the command of GOD Almighty, fed him every day, and preſerved his life.

And the word of the Lord came unto Elijah, ſaying, hide thyſelf by the brook Cerith, that is before Jordon, and I have commanded the ravens to feed thee there. And the ravens brought him bread and fleſh in the morning, and bread and fleſh in the evening, and he drank of the brooks. Kings, B. 1. C. 17.

And the pretty pigeon, when the world world was drowned, and he was confined with Noah in the ark, was sent forth by him to see whether the waters were abated. And he sent forth a dove from him, to see if the waters were abated from off the face of the ground. And the dove came in to him in the evening; and lo, in her mouth was an olive leave plucked off: So Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth. Gen. viii. 8, 11.

As these, and other animals, are so sensible and kind to us, we ought to be tender and good to them, and not beat them about and kill them, and take away their young ones, as many wicked boys do. Does not the horse and the ass carry you and your burthens; don't the ox plough your ground, the cow give you milk, the sheep clothe your back, the the dog watch your houſe, the gooſe find you in quills to write with, the hen bring eggs for your cuſtards and puddings, and the cock call you up in the morning, when you are lazy, and like to hurt yourſelves by laying too long in bed: If ſo, how can you be ſo cruel to them, and abuſe GOD Almighty's good creatures? Go, naughty boy, go; be ſorry for what you have done, and do ſo no more, that GOD Almighty may forgive you. Amen, ſay I, again and again. GOD will bleſs you, but not unleſs you are merciful and good.

The downfall of the ſchool was a great misfortune to Mrs. Margery; for ſhe not only loſt all her books, but was deſtitute of a place to teach in; but Sir William Dove, being informed of this, ordered the houſe to be built at his own expence, and until until that could be done, Farmer Grove was ſo kind, as to let her have his large hall to teach in.

The houſe built by ſir William, had a ſtatue erected over the door, of a boy ſliding on the ice, and under it were theſe lines, written by Mrs. Twoſhoes, and engraved at her expence.

On

On SIN. A SIMILE.

As a poor Urchin on the ice,
When he has tumbled once or twice,
With cautious ſtep, and trembling goes,
The drop ſtill pendant on his noſe,
And trudges on to ſeek the ſhore,
Reſolv'd to truſt the ice no more:
But meeting with a daring mate,
Who often us'd to ſlide and ſkate,
Again is into danger led,
And falls again and breaks his head.
So Youth when firſt they're drawn to ſin,
And ſee the danger they are in,
Would gladly quit the thorny way,
And think it is unſafe to ſtay;
But meeting with their wicked train,
Return with them to ſin again;
With them the paths of vice explore,
With them are ruin'd evermore.

CHAP. IV.

What happened at Farmer Grove's, and how ſhe gratified him for the Uſe of his Room.

WHILE at Mr. Grove's, which was in the heart of the village, ſhe not only taught the children in the day time, but the farmer's ſervants, and all the neighbours, to read and write in the evening; and it was a conſtant practice before they went away, to make them all go to prayers, and ſing Pſalms. By this means, the people grew extremely regular, his ſervants were always at home, inſtead of being at the alehouſe, and he had more work done than ever. This gave gave not only Mr. Grove, but all the neighbours, an high opinion of her good ſenſe and prudent behaviour: And ſhe was ſo much eſteemed, that moſt of the differences in the pariſh were left to her deciſion; and if a man and wife quarrelled (which ſometimes happened in that part of the kingdom) both parties certainly came to her for advice. Every body knows, that Martha Wilſon was a paſſionate ſcolding jade, and that John her huſband, was a ſurly ill tempered fellow. Theſe were one day brought by the neighbours, for Margery to talk to them, when they fairly quarrelled before her, and were going to blows; but ſhe ſtepping between them, thus addreſſed the huſband; John, ſays ſhe, you are a man, and ought to have more ſenſe than to fly in in a paſſion, at every word that is ſaid amiſs by your wife; and Martha, ſays ſhe, you ought to know your duty better, than to ſay any thing to aggravate your huſband's reſentment. Theſe frequent quarrels ariſe from the indulgence of your violent paſſions: For I know you both love one another, notwithſtanding what has paſſed between you. Now, pray tell me John, and tell me Martha, when you have had a quarrel over night, are you not both ſorry for it the next day? They both declared that they were: Why then, ſays ſhe, I'll tell you how to prevent this for the future, if you will both promiſe to take my advice. They both promiſed her. You know, ſays ſhe, that a ſmall ſpark will ſet fire to tinder, and that tinder

properly

properly placed will fire a houſe; an angry word is with you as that ſpark, for you are both as touchy as tinder, and very often make your own houſe too hot to hold you. To prevent this, therefore, and to live happily for the future, you muſt ſolemnly agree, that if one ſpeaks an angry word, the other will not anſwer, until he or ſhe has diſtinctly called over all the letters in the alphabet, and the other not reply until he has told, twenty; by this means your paſſions will be ſtifled, and reaſon will have time to take the rule.

This is the beſt recipe that was ever given for a married couple to live in peace: Though John and his wife frequently attempted to quarrel afterwards, they never could get their paſſions to any conſiderable height, for there was ſomething ſo droll in thus carrying on the diſpute, that before they got to the end of the argument, they ſaw the abſurdity of it, laughed, kiſſed and were friends.

Juſt as Mrs. Margery had ſettled this difference between John and his wife, the children (who had been ſent out to play, while that buſineſs was tranſacting returned, ſome in tears, and others very diſconſolate, for the loſs of a little dormouſe they were very fond of, and which was juſt dead. Mrs. Margery who had the art of moralizing and drawing inſtructions from every accident, took this opportunity of reading them a lecture on the uncertainty of life, and the neceſſity of being always prepared for death. You ſhould get up in the morning, ſays ſhe, and ſo conduct yourſelves, as if that day were to be your laſt, and lie down at night, as if you never expected to ſee the world any more. This may be done, ſays ſhe, without abating of your cheerfulneſs, for you are not to conſider death as an evil, but as a convenience, as an uſeful pilot, who is to convey you to a place of greater happineſs: Therefore, play, my dear children, and be merry; but be innocent and good. The good man ſets death at defiance, for his darts are only dreadful to the wicked.

get

After this ſhe permitted the children to bury the little dormouſe, and deſired one of them to write his epitaph, and here it is.

Epitaph

Epitaph on a DORMOUSE, really written by a little BOY.

I.

In paper caſe,
Hard by this place,
Dead a poor dormouſe lies;
And ſoon or late,
Summon'd by fate,
Each Prince, each Monarch dies.

II.

Ye ſons of verſe,
While I rehearſe,
Attend inſtructive rhyme:
No ſins had Dor
To anſwer for;
Repent of yours in time.

CHAP. V.

The whole History of the Considering Cap, set forth at large for the Benefit of all whom it may concern.

THE great reputation Mrs. Margery acquired by composing differences in families, and especially between man and wife, induced her to cultivate that part of her system of morality and economy, in order to render it more extensively useful. For this purpose, she contrived what she called a charm for the passions; which was a considering cap, almost as large as a grenadier's, but of three equal sides; on the first of which was written, I MAY BE WRONG; on the second, IT IS FIFTY TO ONE BUT YOU ARE; and and on the third, I'LL CONSIDER OF IT. The other parts, on the out ſide were filled with odd characters, as unintelligible as the writings of the old Egyptians; but within ſide there was a direction for its uſe, of the utmoſt conſequence; for it ſtrictly enjoined the poſſeſſor to put on the cap, whenever he found his paſſions begin to grow turbulent, and not to deliver deliver a word whilſt it was on, but with great coolneſs and moderation. As this cap was an univerſal cure for wrong headedneſs, and prevented numberleſs diſputes and quarrels, it greatly hurt the trade of the poor lawyers, but was of the utmoſt ſervice to the reſt of the community. They were bought by huſbands and wives, who had themſelves frequent occaſion for them, and ſometimes lent them to their children: They were alſo purchaſed in large quantities by maſters and ſervants; by young folks who were intent on matrimony, by judges, jurymen, and even phyſicians and divines; nay, if we may believe hiſtory, the legiſlators of the land did not diſdain the uſe of them; and we are told, that when any important debate aroſe, cap, was the word, and each

each house looked like a grand synod of Egyptian Priests. Nor was this cap of less use to partners in trade, for with these, as well as with husbands and wives, if one was out of humour, the other threw him the cap, and he was obliged to put it on, and kept it until all was quiet. I myself saw thirteen caps worn at a time in one family, which could not have subsisted an hour without them; and I was particularly pleased at Sir Humphry Huffum's, to hear a little girl, when her father was out of humour, ask her mamma, if she should reach down the cap? These caps, indeed were of such utility, that people of sense never went without them; and it was common in the country, when a booby made his appearance, and talked nonsense, to say, he had no cap in his pocket.

Advice

Advice from FRIAR BACON.

What was Fortunatus's wiſhing cap, when compared to this? That cap is ſaid to have conveyed people inſtantly from one place to another; but as the change of place does not change the temper and diſpoſition of the mind, little benefit can be expected from it; nor indeed is much to be hoped from his famous purſe: That purſe, it is ſaid, was never empty, and ſuch a purſe may be ſometimes convenient; but as money will not purchaſe peace, it is not neceſſary for a man to encumber himſelf with a great deal of it. Peace and happineſs depend ſo much upon the ſtate of a man's own mind, and upon the uſe of the Conſidering Cap, that it is generally his own fault, if he is miſerable. One of theſe caps will laſt a man his whole life, and is a diſcovery of much greater importance to the publick than the philoſopher's ſtone. Remember what was ſaid by my brazen head, Time is! Time was! Time is paſt! Now the time is, therefore buy the cap immediately, and make a proper uſe of it, and be happy before the the time is paſt.

to

Your's, ROGER BACON.

CHAP. VI.

How Mrs. Margery was taken up for a Witch, and what happened on that occasion.

AND so it is true? And they have taken up Mrs. Margery then, and accused her of being a witch, only because she was wiser than some of her neighbours! Mercy upon me! People stuff children's heads with stories of ghosts, fairies, witches, and such nonsense, when they are young, and so they continue fools all their days. The whole world ought to be made acquainted with her case, and here it is at their service.

The Case of Mrs. MARGERY.

Mrs. Margery, as we have frequently observed, was always doing good, and and thought ſhe could never ſufficiently gratify thoſe who had done any thing to ſerve her. Theſe generous ſentiments naturally led her to conſult the intereſt of Mr. Grove, and the reſt of her neighbours ; and as moſt of their lands were meadow, and they depended much on their hay, which had been for many years greatly damaged by wet weather, ſhe contrived an inſtrument to direct them when to mow their graſs with ſafety, and prevent their hay from being ſpoiled. They all came to her for advice, and by that means got in their hay without damage while moſt of that in the neighbouring village was ſpoiled.

This made a great noiſe in the country, and ſo provoked were the people in other pariſhes, that they accuſed her of being a witch, and ſent ſent Gaffer Gooſecap, a buſy fellow in other people's concerns, to find out evidence againſt her. The wiſe-acre happened to come to her ſchool, when ſhe was walking about with the raven on one ſhoulder, the pigeon on the other, the lark on her hand, and the lamb and the dog by her ſide; which indeed make a droll figure, and ſo ſurpriſed the man, that he cried out, a witch!

a witch! a witch! upon this ſhe, laughing, anſwered, a conjurer! a conjurer! and ſo they parted; but it did not end thus, for a warrant was iſſued out againſt Mrs. Margery, and ſhe was carried to a meeting of the juſtices, whither all the neighbours followed her.

At the meeting, one of the juſtices, who knew little of life, and leſs of the law, behaved very idly; and though no body was able to prove any thing againſt her, aſked, who ſhe could bring to her character? Who can you bring againſt my character, Sir? ſays ſhe. There are people enough who would appear in my defence, were it neceſſary; but I never ſuppoſed that any one here could be ſo weak, as to believe there was any ſuch thing as a witch. If I am a witch, this is my charm, and (laying a barometer or weather-glaſs on the table) it is with this ſays ſhe, that I have taught my neighbours to know the ſtate of the weather. All the company laughed; and Sir William Dove, who was on the Bench, aſked her accuſers, how they could be ſuch fools as to think there was any ſuch thing as a witch. It is true, continued he, many innocent and worthy people have been abuſed and even murdered on this abſurd and fooliſh ſuppoſition, which is a ſcandal to our religion, to our laws, to our nation, and to common ſenſe; but I will tell you a ſtory.

and

There was in the weſt of England a poor induſtrious woman, who laboured under the ſame evil report, which this good woman is accuſed of. Every hog that died with the murrain, murrian, every cow that ſlipt her calf, ſhe was accountable for: If a horſe had the ſtaggers, ſhe was ſuppoſed to be in his head; and whenever the wind blew a little harder than ordinary, Goody Giles was playing her tricks, and riding upon a a broomſtick in the air. Theſe, and a thouſand other phantaſies, too ridiculous to recite, poſſeſſed the pates of the common people: Horſe ſhoes were nailed with the heels upwards, and many tricks made uſe of, to mortify the poor creature; and ſuch was their rage againſt her, that they petitioned Mr. Williams, the parſon of the pariſh, not to let her come to church; and, at laſt, even inſiſted upon it: But this he overruled, and allowed the poor old woman a nook in one of the iſles to herſelf, where ſhe muttered over her prayers in the beſt

beſt manner ſhe could. The pariſh, thus diſconcerted and enraged, withdrew the ſmall pittance they allowed for her ſupport, and would have reduced her to the neceſſity of ſtarving, had ſhe not been ſtill aſſiſted by the benevolent Mr. Williams.

But I haſten to the ſequel of my ſtory, in which you will find, that the true ſource from whence witchcraft ſprings is poverty, age, and ignorance; and that it is impoſſible for a woman to paſs for a witch, unleſs ſhe is very poor, very old, and lives in a neighbourhood where the people are void of common ſenſe.

Some time after, a brother of her's died in London, who, though he would not part with a farthing while he lived, at his death was obliged to leave her five thouſand pounds, that he could not carry with him.

——This altered the face of Jane's affairs prodigiously: She was no longer Jane, alias Joan Giles, the ugly old witch, but Madam Giles; her old ragged garb was exchanged for one that was new and genteel; her greatest enemies made their court to her, even the Justice himself came to wish her joy; and though several hogs and horses died, and the wind frequently blew afterwards, yet Madam Giles was never supposed to have a hand in it; and from hence it is plain, as I observed before, that a woman must be very poor, very old, and live in a neighbourhood, where the people are very stupid, before she can possibly pass for a witch.

It was a saying of Mr. Williams, who would sometimes be jocose, and had the art of making even satire agreeagreeable; that if ever Jane deſerved the character of a witch, it was after this money was left her; for that with her five thouſand pounds, ſhe did more acts of charity and friendly offices, than all the people of fortune within fifty miles of the place.

After this, Sir William inveighed againſt the abſurd and fooliſh notions, which the country people had imbibed concerning witches, and witchcraft, and having proved that there was no ſuch thing, but that all were the effects of folly and ignorance, he gave the court ſuch an account of Mrs. Margery, and her virtue, good ſenſe, and prudent behaviour, that the gentlemen preſent were enamoured with her, and returned her publick thanks for the great ſervice ſhe had done the country.

try. One gentleman in particular, I mean Sir Charles Jones, had conceived ſuch an high opinion of her that he offered her a conſiderable ſum to take the care of his family, and the education of his daughter, which however, ſhe refuſed; but this gentleman, ſending for her afterwards when he had a dangerous fit of illneſs, ſhe went, and behaved ſo prudently in the family, and ſo tenderly to him, and his daughter, that he would not permit her to leave his houſe, but ſoon after made her propoſals of marriage. She was truly ſenſible of the honour he intended her, but, though poor, ſhe would not conſent to be made a lady, until he had effectually provided for his daughter; for ſhe told him, that power was a dangerous thing to be truſted with, and that a good man or woman would never

never throw themſelves into the road of temptation.

All things being ſettled, and the day fixed, the neighbours came in crouds to ſee the wedding; for they were all glad, that one who had been ſuch a good little girl, and was become ſuch a virtuous and good woman was going to be made a lady: but juſt as the clergyman had opened his book, a gentleman richly dreſſed ran ran into the church, and cried, Stop! ſtop! This greatly alarmed the congregation, particularly the intended bride and bridegroom, whom he firſt accoſted, and deſired to ſpeak with them apart. After they had been talking ſome little time, the people were greatly ſurprized to ſee Sir Charles ſtand motionleſs, and his bride cry and faint away in the ſtranger's arms. This ſeeming grief, however, was only a prelude to a flood of joy, which immediately ſucceeded; for you muſt know, gentle reader, that this gentleman, ſo richly dreſſed and bedizened with lace, was the identical little boy, whom you before ſaw in the ſailor's habit; in ſhort it was little Tom Twoſhoes, Mrs. Margery's brother, who was juſt come from beyond ſea, where he had made a large fortune,

and

and hearing, as ſoon as he landed, of his ſiſter's intended wedding, had rode poſt, to ſee that a proper ſettlement was made on her; which he thought ſhe was now intitled to, as he himſelf was both able and willing to give her an ample fortune. They ſoon returned to the communion table, and were married in tears, but they were tears of joy.

There is ſomething wonderful in this young gentleman's preſervation and ſucceſs in life; which we ſhall acquaint the reader of, in the Hiſtory of his Life and Adventures, which will ſoon be publiſhed.

CHAP.

CHAP. VII. and last.

The true Use of Riches.

THE harmony and affection that subsisted between this happy couple, is inexpressible; but time, which dissolves the closest union, after six years, severed Sir Charles from his lady; for being seized with a violent fever he died, and left her full of grief, though possessed of a large fortune.

We forgot to remark, that after her marriage, Lady Jones (for so we must now call her) ordered the chappel to be fitted up, and allowed the chaplain a considerable sum out of her own private purse, to visit the sick, and say prayers every day to all the people that could attend.

She

She alſo gave Mr. Johnſon ten guineas a year, to preach a ſermon annually, on the neceſſity and duties of the marriage ſtate ; and on the deceaſe of Sir Charles, ſhe gave him ten more, to preach yearly on the ſubject of death : ſhe had put all the pariſh into mourning for the loſs of her huſband : and to thoſe men who attended this yearly ſervice, ſhe gave harveſt gloves, to their wives ſhoes and ſtockings, and to all the children little books and plumb cake : We muſt alſo obſerve, that ſhe herſelf wove a chaplet of flowers, and before the ſervice, placed it on his grave ſtone ; and a ſuitable Pſalm was always ſung by the congregation.

About this time, ſhe heard that Mr. Smith was oppreſſed by Sir Timothy othy Gripe, the Juſtice, and his friend Graſpall, who endeavoured to deprive him of part of his tithes; upon which ſhe in conjunction with her brother, defended him, and the cauſe was tried in Weſtminſter hall, where Mr. Smith gained a verdict; and it appearing that Sir Timothy had behaved moſt ſcandalouſly, as a Juſtice of the peace, he was ſtruck off the liſt, and no longer permitted to act in that capacity. This was a cut to a man of his imperious diſpoſition, and this was followed by one yet more ſevere; for a relation of his who had an undoubted right to the Mouldwell eſtate, finding that it was poſſible to get the better at law of a rich man, laid claim to it, brought his action, and recovered the whole manor of Mouldwell; and being afterwards wards inclined to ſell it, he, in conſideration of the aid Lady Margery had lent him during his diſtreſs, made her the firſt offer, and ſhe purchaſed the whole, and threw it into different farms that the poor might be no longer under the dominion of two overgrown men.

This was a great mortification to Sir Timothy, as well as to his friend Graſpall, who from this time experienced nothing but misfortunes, and was in a few years ſo diſpoſſeſſed of his illgotten wealth, that his family were reduced to ſeek ſubſiſtence from the pariſh, at which thoſe who had felt the weight of his iron hand rejoiced; but Lady Margery deſired, that his children might be treated with care and tenderneſs: For they, ſays ſhe, are no ways accountable for the actions of their father.

At

At her firſt coming into power, ſhe took care to gratify her old friends, eſpecially Mr. and Mrs. Smith, whoſe family ſhe made happy.—She paid great regard to the poor, made their intereſt her own, and to induce them to come regularly to church, ſhe ordered a loaf, or the price of a loaf, to be given to every one who would accept of it. This brought many of them to church, who by degrees learned their duty, and then came on a more noble principle. She alſo took care to encourage matrimony; and in order to induce her tenants and neighbours to enter into that happy ſtate, ſhe always gave the young couple ſomething towards houſekeeping; and ſtood godmother to all their children, whom ſhe had in parties every Sunday evening, to teach them their catechiſm, and lecture

lecture them in religion and morality; after which she treated them with a supper, gave them such books as they wanted, and then dispatched them with her blessing. Nor did she forget them at her death, but left each a legacy, as will be seen among other charitable donations when we publish her will, which we may do in some future volume. There is one request however so singular, that we cannot help taking some notice of it in this place; which is that of her giving so many acres of land to be planted yearly with potatoes, for all the poor of any parish who would come and fetch them for the use of their families; but if any took them to sell they were deprived of that privilege ever after. And these roots were planted and raised from the rent arising from a farm which she had assigned aſſigned over for that purpoſe. In ſhort, ſhe was a mother to the poor, a phyſician to the ſick, and a friend to all who were in diſtreſs. Her life was the greateſt bleſſing, and her death the greateſt calamity that ever was felt in the neighbourhood. A monument, but without inſcription, was erected to her memory in the church yard, over which the poor as they paſs wept continually, ſo that the ſtone is ever bathed in tears.

On this occaſion the following lines were ſpoken extempore by a young gentleman.

How vain the tears that fall from you,
And here ſupply the place of dew?
How vain to weep the happy dead,
Who now to heavenly realms are fled?
Repine no more, your plaints forbear,
And all prepare to meet them there.

THE END.

APPENDIX.

The GOLDEN DREAM; or the INGENUOUS CONFESSION.

TO ſhew the depravity of human nature, and how apt the mind is to be miſled by trinkets and falſe appearances, Mrs. Twoſhoes does acknowledge, that after ſhe became rich, ſhe had like to have have been too fond of money; for on ſeeing her huſband receive a very large ſum, her heart went pit pat, pit pat, all the evening, and ſhe began to think that guineas were pretty things. To ſuppreſs this turbulence of mind, which was a ſymptom of approaching avarice, ſhe ſaid her prayers earlier than uſual, and at night had the following dream; which I ſhall relate in her own words.

"Methought, as I ſlept, a Genii ſtept up to me with a French commode which having placed on my head, he ſaid, Now go and be happy; for from henceforth every thing you touch ſhall turn to gold. Willing to try the experiment, I gently touched the bed poſt and furniture, which immediately became maſſy gold burniſhed, and of ſurpriſing brightneſs. I then touched the walls of the houſe, which aſſumed the ſame appearance, and looked amazingly magnificent. Elated with this wonderful gift, I ran haſtily for my maid to carry this joyful news to her maſter, who as I thought, was then walking in the garden. Sukey came, but in the extacy, I was in, happening to touch her hand, ſhe became inſtantly an immoveable ſtatue. Go, ſaid I, and call your maſter; but ſhe made no reply, nor could ſhe ſtir. Upon this I ſhrieked, and in came my dear huſband, whom I ran to embrace; when no ſooner had I touched him, but he became good for nothing; that is good for nothing but his weight in gold; and that you know could be nothing where gold was ſo plenty. At this inſtant up came another ſervant with a glaſs of water, thinking me ill; this I attempted to ſwallow, but no ſooner did it touch my mouth, than it became a hard ſolid body and unfit for drinking. My diſtreſs now grew inſupportable: I had deſtroyed, as I thought, my dear huſband, and my favourite ſervant; and I plainly perceived, that I ſhould die for want in the midſt of ſo much wealth. Ah, ſaid I, why did I long for riches? Having enough already, why did I covet more? Thus terrified I began to rave, and beat my breaſt, which awaked Sir Charles, who kindly called me from this ſtate of inquietude, and compoſed my mind.'

to

This ſcene I have often conſidered as a leſſon, inſtructing me that a load of riches bring, inſtead of felicity, a load of troubles; and that the only ſource of happineſs is contentment. Go, therefore, you who have too much, and give it to thoſe who are in want; ſo ſhall you be happy yourſelves, by making others happy. This is a precept from the Almighty, a precept which muſt be regarded; for the Lord is about your paths, and about your bed, and ſpieth out all your ways.

An Anecdote, concerning TOM TWO-SHOES, communicated by a Gentleman, who is now writing the Hiſtory of his Life.

IT is generally known, that Tom Two-ſhoes went to ſea when he was a very little boy, and very poor; and that he returned a very great man, and very rich; but no one knows how he acquired ſo much wealth but himſelf, and a few friends, friends, who have perufed the papers from which I am compiling the Hiftory of his Life.

After Tom had been at fea fome years, he was unfortunately caft away, on that part of the coaft of Africa inhabited by the Hottentots. Here he met with a ftrange book, which the Hottentots did not underftand, and which gave him fome account of Prefter John's country; and being a lad of great curiofity and resolution, he determined to fee it; accordingly he fet out on the purfuit, attended by a young lion, which he had tamed, and made fo fond of him, that he followed him like a dog, and obeyed all his commands: And indeed it was happy for him that he had fuch a companion; for as his road lay through large woods and forefts that were full of wild beafts, and without inhabitants, he muft have been foon ftarved or torn in pieces, had he not been both fed and protected by this noble animal.

Tom

Tom had provided himſelf with two guns, a ſword, and as much powder and ball as he could carry; whith theſe arms, and ſuch a companion, it was mighty eaſy for him to get food; for the animals in theſe wild and extenſive foreſts, having never ſeen the effects of a gun, readily ran from the lion, who hunted on one ſide, to Tom, who hunted on the other, ſo that they were either caught by the lion, or ſhot by his maſter; and it was pleaſant enough, after a hunting match, and the meat was dreſſed, to ſee how cheek by jole they ſat down to dinner.

When they came into the land of Utopia he diſcovered the ſtatue of a man erected on an open plain, which had this inſcription on the pedeſtal: On May day in the morning when the ſun riſes, I ſhall have a head of gold. As it was now the latter end of April, he ſtayed to ſee this wonderful change; and in the mean time, enquiring of a poor ſhepherd what was the reaſon of the ſtatue being erected there, and with that inſcription, he was informed, that it was ſet up many years ago by an Arabian philoſopher, who travelled all the world over in

ſearch

ſearch of a real friend : that he lived with, and was extremely fond of a great man who inhabited the next mountain; but that on ſome occaſion they quarrelled, and the philoſopher, leaving the mountain, retired into the plain, where he erected this ſtatue with his own hands, and ſoon after died. To this he added, that all the people for many leagues, round came there every May morning expecting to ſee the ſtone head turned to gold.

Tom got up very early on the firſt of May to behold this amazing change, and when he came near the ſtatue he ſaw a number of people, who all ran away from him in the utmoſt conſternation, having never before ſeen a lion follow a man like a lap dog. Being thus left alone, he fixed his eyes on the ſun, then riſing with reſplendent majeſty, and afterwards turned to the ſtatue, but could ſee no change in the ſtone.—— Surely, ſays he to himſelf, there is ſome myſtical meaning in this! This inſcription muſt be an ænigma, the hidden meaning of which I will endeavour to find;

find; for a philoſopher will never expect a ſtone to be turned to gold: accordingly he meaſured the length of the ſhadow, which the ſtatue gave on the ground by the ſun ſhining on it, and marked that particular part where the head fell, then getting a chopneſs (a thing like a ſpade) and digging, he diſcovered a copper cheſt, full of gold, with this inſcription engraved on the lid of it.

Thy WIT,
Oh Man! whoever thou art,
Hath diſcloſed the Ænigma,
And diſcover'd the GOLDEN HEAD.
Take it and uſe it,
But uſe it with WISDOM;
For know,
That GOLD, properly employ'd,
May diſpenſe Bleſſings,
And promote the Happineſs of Mortals;
But when hoarded up,
Or miſapply'd,
Is but Trash, that makes Mankind miſerable.
Remember
The unprofitable Servant,

Who

Who hid his Talent in a Napkin;
And
The profligate Son, Who ſquander'd away his Subſtance, and fed with the Swine.
As thou haſt got the GOLDEN HEAD,
Obſerve the Golden Mean,
Be good and be happy.

This leſſon, coming as it were from the dead, ſtruck him with ſuch awe and reverence for piety and virtue, that before he removed the treaſure, he kneeled down, and earneſtly and fervently prayed that he might make a prudent, juſt, and proper uſe of it. He then conveyed the cheſt away; but how he got it to England, the reader will be informed in the hiſtory of his life. It may not be improper, however, in this place, to give the reader ſome account of the philoſopher who hid this treaſure, and took ſo much pains to find a true and real friend to enjoy it. As Tom had reaſon to veherate his memory, he was very particular in his enquiry, and had this character of him;——that he was a man man well acquainted with nature and with trade; that he was pious, friendly, and of a ſweet and affable diſpoſition. That he had acquired a fortune by commerce, and having no relations to leave it to, he travelled through Arabia, Perſia, India, Lybia, and Utopia, in ſearch of a real friend. In this purſuit he found ſeveral, with whom he exchanged good offices, and that were polite and obliging, but they often flew off for trifles, or as ſoon as he pretended to be in diſtreſs, and requeſted their aſſiſtance, left him to ſtruggle with his own difficulties. So true is that copy in our books, which ſays, Adverſity is the touchſtone of friendſhip. At laſt, however, he met with the Utopian philoſopher, or the wiſe Man of the Mountain as he is called, and thought in him he had found the friend he wanted; for though he often pretended to be in diſtreſs, and abandoned to the frowns of fortune, this man always relieved him and with ſuch cheerfulneſs and ſincerity, that concluding he had found out the only man to whom he ought to open both his purſe

and

and his heart, he let him ſo far into his ſecrets, as to deſire his aſſiſtance in hiding a large ſum of money, which he wanted to conceal, leſt the Prince of the country, who was abſolute, ſhould, by the advice of his wicked miniſter, put him to death for his gold. The two philoſophers met and hid the money, which the ſtranger, after ſome days, went to ſee, but found it gone. How was he ſtruck to the heart, when he found that his friend, whom he had often tried, and who had relieved him in his diſtreſs, could not withſtand this temptation, but broke through the ſacred bonds of friendſhip, and turned even a thief for gold which he did not want, as he was already very rich. Oh! ſaid he, what is the heart of man made of? Why I am condemned to live among people who have no ſincerity, and who barter the moſt ſacred ties of friendſhip and humanity for the dirt that we tread on? Had I loſt my gold, and found a real friend, I ſhould have been happy with the exchange, but now I am moſt miſerable. After ſome time he wiped off his tears, and being determined not to be impoſed on, he had recourſe to cunning, and the arts of life. He went to his pretended friend with a cheerful countenance, told him he had more gold to hide, and deſired him to appoint a time when they might go together, and open the earth to put it into the ſame pot: The other, in hopes of getting more wealth, appointed the next evening. They went together, opened the ground, and found the money they had firſt placed there, for the artful wretch, he ſo much confided in, had conveyed it again into the pot, in order to obtain more.

off

Our philoſopher immediately took the gold, and putting it into his pocket, told the other he had now altered his mind, and ſhould bury it no more, until he found a man more worthy of his confidence. See what people loſe by being diſhoneſt. This calls to my mind the words of the poet:

A wit's a feather, and a chief's a rod;
An honeſt man's the nobleſt work of God.

Remember

Remember this ſtory, and take care whom you truſt; but don't be covetous, ſordid and miſerable; for the gold we have is but lent us to do good with. We received all from the hand of God, and every perſon in diſtreſs hath a juſt title to a portion of it.

A LETTER

A LETTER from the PRINTER, which he desires may be inserted.

SIR,

I HAVE done with your copy, so you may return it to the Vatican, if you please; and pray tell Mr. Angelo to brush up the cuts, that, in the next edition, they may give us a good impression.

The foresight and sagacity of Mrs. Margery's dog, calls to my mind a circumstance which happened when I was a boy. Some gentlemen in the place where I lived had been hunting, and were got under a great tree to shelter themselves from a thunder storm; when a dog that always followed one of the gentlemen leaped up at his horse several times, and then ran away and barked. At last, the gentlemen all followed to see what he would be at; and they were no sooner gone from the tree, but it was shivered in pieces by lightning! It is remarkable, that as soon as they came from the tree, the dog appeared to be very well satisfied, and barked no more. The gentleman after this always regarded the dog as his friend, treated him in his old age with great tenderness, and fed him with milk as long as he lived.

My

My old mafter Grierfon had alfo a dog, that ought to be mentioned with regard; for he ufed to fet him up as a pattern of fagacity and prudence, not only to his journeymen, but to all the neighbours. This dog had been taught a thousand tricks, and among other feats he could dance, tumble, and drink wine and punch until he was little better than mad. It happened one day when the men had made him drunk with liquor, and he was capering about, that he fell into a large veffel of boiling water. They foon got him out, and he recovered; but he was very much hurt; and being fenfible that this accident arofe from his lofing his fenfes by drinking, he would never tafte any ftrong liquors afterwards. —My old mafter, on relating this ftory and fhewing the dog, ufed to addrefs us thus, Ah, my friends, had you but half the fenfe of this poor dog, you would never get fuddled, and be fools.

I am, Sir, Yours, &c.

BOOKS for the Instruction and Amusement of Children, which will make them wise and happy, printed and sold by I. THOMAS, in Worcester, Massachusetts, near the Court-House.

THE BROTHER's GIFT ; or the naughty Girl reformed. Published for the Advantage of the rising Generation.

The SISTER's GIFT ; or the naughty Boy reformed.

The FATHER's GIFT ; or the Way to be wise and happy.

The MOTHER's GIFT ; or a Present for all little Children who wish to be good.

The FAIRING : Or, a golden Toy for Children of all Sizes and Denominations.

In which they may see all the Fun of the Fair,
And at Home be as happy as if they were there.

The SUGAR-PLUMB ; or Sweet Amusement for Leisure Hours : Being an Entertaining and instructive Collection of Stories. Embellished with curious Cuts.

BOOKS Sold by I. THOMAS.

The HOLY BIBLE abridged; or, the History of the Old and New Testament. Illustrated with Notes and adorned with Cuts. For the use of Children.

The History of little King PIPPIN; with an Account of the melancholy Death of four naughty Boys, who were devoured by wild Beasts. And the wonderful Delivery of Master Harry Harmless, by a little white Horse.

A BAG of NUTS, ready cracked; or instructive Fables, ingenious Riddles, and merry Conundrums. By the celebrated and facetious Thomas Thumb, Esq. Published for the Benefit of all little Masters and Misses who love reading as well as playing.

Nurse TRUELOVE's new Year's Gift; or the Book of Books for Children. Adorned with Cuts: And designed for a Present to every little Boy who would become a great Man, and ride upon a fine Horse; and to every little Girl, who would become a great Woman, and ride in a Governour's gilt Coach.

001284 A/142.

RESTORATION CONTROL NO. 001284

TITLE: Goody Twoshoes Worcester 1787

CONSERVATORS: C. Clarkson
E. Terry
N. Jones

DATE: June 1975

CONDITION UPON RECEIPT

The book was received without covers but was sewn. Several leaves in the beginning and end of the text-block were soft.

sewing holes. The lowest cord and the tail kettle stitch utilized the same hole. The book was rounded and backed and the spine covered with Japanese paper. Shaped boards of laminated all rag matting board were laced onto the text-block. A single primary head band was worked in unbleached linen thread and stubbed. A piece of rolled Japanese paper was used instead of a tail band. The book was covered with full goat skin.

For further information refer to Restoration Office Master Control No. 001284.

RESTORATION CONTROL NO. 001284

TITLE: Goody Twoshoes Worcester 1787

CONSERVATORS: C. Clarkson
E. Terry
N. Jones

DATE: June 1975

CONDITION UPON RECEIPT

The book was received without covers but was sewn. Several leaves in the beginning and end of the text-block were soft.

CONSERVATION TREATMENT

The book was pulled. The soft leaves were resized using parchment size. Tears in the text-block and along the spine folds were mended with Japanese paper and paste. New end sheets of handmade paper were added and the book was sewn on five raised cords with unbleached linen thread using previous sewing holes. The lowest cord and the tail kettle stitch utilized the same hole. The book was rounded and backed and the spine covered with Japanese paper. Shaped boards of laminated all rag matting board were laced onto the text-block. A single primary head band was worked in unbleached linen thread and stubbed. A piece of rolled Japanese paper was used instead of a tail band. The book was covered with full goat skin.

For further information refer to Restoration Office Master Control No. 001284.

PZ
.G
H
Co
R

PZ6
.G639
H
Copy 1
RBSC

22005814

2.06.1386.1038.4 , T24