To whom it may concern,

I am writing in response to Article "78866" re: jail breaking of iPhones and other mobile devices. As a software engineer, allowing citizens who have the desire and competency to perform such actions, should absolutely be allowed to do so. Any limiting of such activities would severely stifle innovation, competition and creative expression. Imagine a law that disallows one from installing a custom stereo in ones car, or makes it illegal to fix ones own plumbing, or fines someone every time they use a home appliance for something other than it was intended. I am sure the ridiculousness is apparent when considering the following: seeking legal action against a US Citizen for using a "toaster" to make something other than "toast"

Sincerely,

Brennan Novak
