

This correspondence is written in support of allowing consumers to jailbreak personal computing devices, including video game systems, phones, and tablet pc's. I am both an avid user and hobbyist. I have a right to modify items that I purchase if it does not adversely affect the company producing the unit. Why can I buy a T-Shirt and dye it or sew something on to it, and then face possible penalties when I modify a piece of electronic hardware to better suit my likings?

Thanks,

Duane McClellan