

January 26, 2012

To whom it may concern,

When a person owns a specific device what they do with it should be their right. Not only do many people rely on jailbreaks to provide their phone with a carrier "unlock" but it allows them to increase the functionality of their iphone to awesome proportions. There are some repositories that shouldn't be allowed such as Hackulos where people can download pirated versions of applications that developers work hard to build to provide the end user with the best user experience possible. If you only crack down on the companies such as Megaupload, Fileape, and many other bit torrents this would alleviate the problem. To take away a persons right to open the functionality of their phone is totally unjust and unfair. A few bad apples shouldn't ruin it for the whole jailbreaking community. Please reconsider any decision that would take this right away from us end users. I can sit here and give a million reasons for it to remain legal but I'm sure others will. Thank you for your time!

Yours truly,

Dustin Glover

Dustin Glover
ddglover80@yahoo.com