

- Class 5 Includes the reply commenter's name; Zachary Sloane
- Includes an identification of a particular class of works to which the reply comment is responsive; Cellular phones/Smartphones/Tablets
- Provides a summary of the argument for each class addressed; and
- Provides particular factual support or legal argument for each class of works opposed or supported in the reply comment. I'm not a lawyer, but I provide an analogy that I believe works.

In my opinion its like this..... I bought and paid for my iPhone/iPad just the same way I bought and paid for my car, and now that car is mine to do with as I see fit. If I want to switch out the engine or paint it a different color or swap the rims, tires, seats or stereo out, I can and have every right to do so. I may be voiding my warranty, but I have the legal right to do so. I still have to buy gas from the gas station in order to run my car just like I still have to pay for cellular service from my provider in order for my device to operate but once I've purchased that car or phone its mine to modify and play all I want, in whatever way I want. If Apple/Samsung etc, want to void my warranty because I chose to modify it outside of what they allow, then I am willing to accept that. I'm not doing anything dangerous or life threatening to myself or anyone else when I use my phone, same way that I'm a responsible driver. Bottom line is... once I've paid in full the price of that iPhone and have left the store, I should be allowed to do anything I want to it....everything from jail breaking it when I get home or throwing it to the pavement, smashing it into pieces the moment I walk out of the store.