They have turned the roof of the house into the prettiest kind of a bower. They're putting candles around in every available place.

The children are getting up fairs and picnics all over town, all for the benefit of the fund.

William Devere started out the other night in the large parlor of the Pentamira House, Seabright, which the proprietor, Mr. Charles H. Deederer, kindly placed at his disposal.

He was little, ragged, one-eyed and tough, but a more business-like youngster than the one who blinks into the Junior Republic office yesterday never counted the nickels in his trouser's pockets.

Absolutely No Truth, He Declares, in Rumors That the Railroad Manager Died Under Gloom-Quances.

The admission to probate on Friday of the will of the late Colonel Frank K. Hain, vice-president and general manager of the Manhattan Elevated Railway Company, was the sequence of the action taken six weeks ago, when the will was offered, asking the appointment as administratrix of Mrs. Hain, his widow.

WHO SHOT CHAS. T. WALL? Police Have Theories, but as Yet That is All That They Can Claim.

All day yesterday the police of the East Twenty-second Street Station tried to solve the mystery of who shot Charles T. Wall, at No. 202 East Seventeenth street, Friday afternoon.

The police have given up the idea that Lathrop had anything to do with the shooting.

Their theory now is that, as Wall says, a sneak thief committed the deed. The police do not seem to be quite sure why they arrested Lathrop.

Mrs. Huzley, the landlady of the house, corroborates Mrs. Spencer's statement. Wall is in a critical condition at Bellevue, and may not live. His condition last night, however, the physicians said, was a little better than it had been.

than the one who blinks into the Junior Republic office yesterday never counted the nickels in his trouser's pockets. "You're a-boostin' the Republic, ain't you?" was his first question.

"Well, here!" He poured two nickels and fifteen pennies on the desk.

"I was up there last year," he explained, "and when I went I wasn't no good to myself or nobody. I was loafin' all the time; I didn't know nothin' and pretty soon I was pinched for stealing the lead pipe out of a joint in Harlem. Mr. George took me up there—ahnd me a-kickin' every step. I tried to run away, got in the jug and everything. Bime-by I caught on that it was easier workin' than fightin' the kid cops, and I come away last Fall. I've been on the square ever since, and now look at me!"

No "self-made man" ever looked prouder than did this youngster.

"It's a good thing, that Republic, and I want to shove it along, so you just put in that quarter for me."

"Ob, I can afford it. I git four plunks a week for drivin' a pedler's wagon."

"What name, please?" He waved the question aside.

"I ain't lookin' for no glory for myself, jus' put it down to 'Poor Boney Publico.'"

That had may be a little weak on his Latin, but he knows the meaning of the signature a great deal better than a whole lot of people who have signed it.

If the men now prosperous were as practically grateful for a lift given them when they were struggling, the $15,000 needed to make the Junior Republic what it ought to be would be raised in a day.

Probably you read the other day about the poor sailor who described himself as "no account" and the man who wanted to put a boy in the Republic and pay $2 a week for him, and who, when the same story was told to him, that the Republic could not accommodate any more, that we are trying to raise money so that more boys can go, gave $2 anyhow, and said: "I'll do my share toward getting that place ready for a lot of new citizens. I kinder want to 'even up' a little if I can."

Well, right on his heels came a letter. It was a good letter, well written. It was full of encouragement and good advice. The writer said he knew all about the Republic, and thought very highly of it. He said he had two boys and he wished he could find a place like that for rich boys. He thought it would be of inestimable value to the community. He praised the Republic and Mr. William George, the founder of it, and the brave little citizens, and the public-spirited people who were helping it, and he signed his name.

That man could not be called "no account." He owns a good, big bank, owns a few miles or so of railroad, and could get his check for half a million honored at day to "cash up."

I wonder if there isn't anything he'd like to "even up."
