

the crowds on the pier, and to the place where his sisters were awaiting him. He recognized them both and kissed them affectionately. Then he was placed in a cab, and with his brother, his sisters and General O'Boyle was taken to the house of a friend in this city. His brother refused to reveal the location of the house.

There is a pronounced difference of opinion about Murphy's sanity. His brother insists that he is sane now, was sane when released from Portland Prison, and that he ran away from the home of his relatives in Ireland because he was anxious to get back to America.

Murphy gives an intelligent account of his wanderings in Ireland. He said that after leaving Skibbereen he struck out toward Cork. He had no money, and in order to get some he worked on a farm for two weeks. Then he walked to Cork, where he was discovered on Anderson Quay looking for a passage home for New York.

Albany, N. Y., Sept. 18.—Whatever financial issue shall come out of Chicago, we must remember that we have to contend with an enemy we have fought for years, an enemy which represents to-day those same forces against which Democracy has always contended; an enemy which is offered by barons and not by patriots; an enemy which deplores the field to enrich the camp; which sneers when we speak of the traditions of our free government, and which regards itself as the ordained government class. It is against such an enemy that the Democracy of the nation must go forth to fight.

As it is his habit, Mr. Thacher thought long over his position, and as a Democrat decided that the course mapped out by the majority of the delegates to the Chicago Convention ought to be followed by him. That determination of Mr. Thacher's will be made plain in his letter of acceptance in terms as terse and as earnest perhaps as those employed in the endorsement of the Chicago ticket and platform by the Buffalo Convention.

Found at His Home. At his summer home on the summit of the Heiderberg Mountains at Altamont, seventeen miles from here, Mr. Thacher was found this afternoon, and he then said he remembered that Democracy had to fight its old enemy.

Mr. Thacher's Life Is Quiet. The life of Mr. Thacher at his mountain cottage is a quiet one. During all the turmoil and excitement of the Buffalo Convention, Mr. Thacher was either at his cottage or the Altamont Fair.

She accompanied him as far as the gate in front of the house, and as he was leaving he kissed her an affectionate adieu. Half way down the block he turned and waved his hand to her. That was the last she saw of him.

"This suspense," she said yesterday, "will kill me. I feel certain. I am in poor health and I cannot stand this terrible strain. I have been to the Morgue, to various hospitals and to Police Headquarters in a vain search for my husband. He may have been murdered, or he may have come under the influence of some woman. Whatever price I can get for them, I cannot bear to look at his picture, for he was always very good to me, and it breaks my heart to believe that he is dead. I have been married to Mr. Johnson three years. I was a widow when he married me. Previous to that he had wedded a woman named Bailey, from whom he secured a divorce after she had gone through his fortune of $90,000. She is now somewhere in Australia. I have known my husband since he was a mere boy. We were sent to school together. They were lost track of each other, but our friendship was renewed about the time he was securing evidence for the divorce proceedings against his first wife.
