

When Field and Fen
Call Maids and Men

They go bear-hunting, we are told, in early mild weather in Oregon. Here are two terrors of the wild, securely roped.

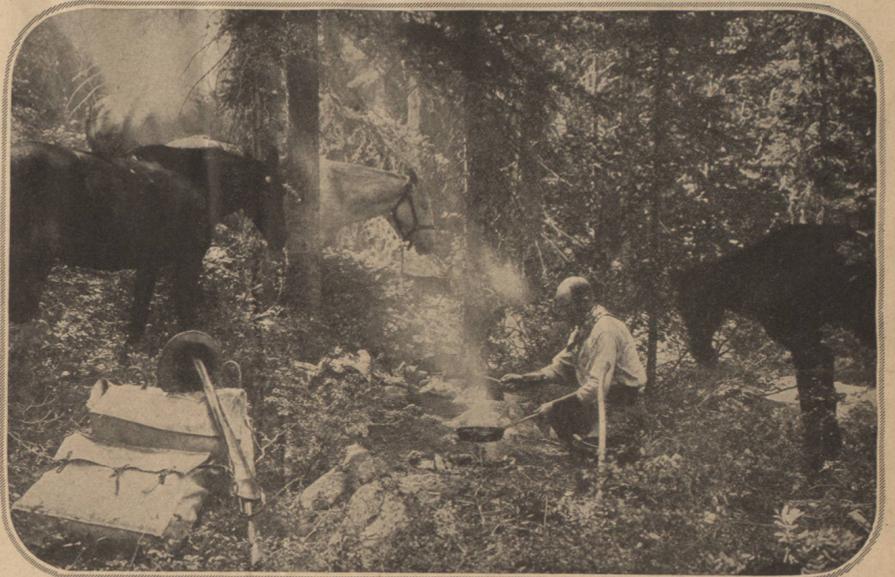

In California everybody turns out at Del Monte for a spring season of polo and kindred sports. To the right is shown Mrs. Alvin Untermyer with her prize dogs out for a morning tramp.

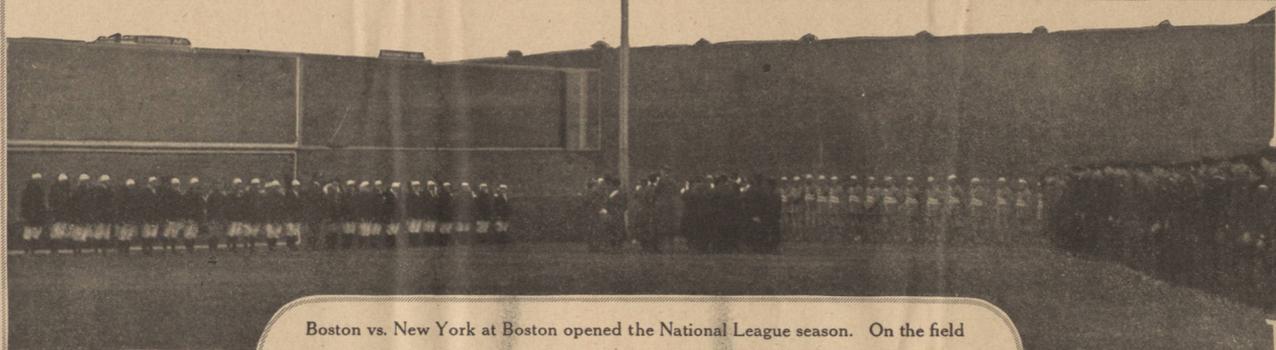

To General Leonard Wood fell the martial duty of throwing the first hand-grenade in the local opening of the American League battle of 1917—in the shape of a new and ceremonial ball. Photo Greeley Service

At the opening game the Yanks appeared on the field in the most impeccable military manner. To the right is shown Sergeant Gibson, who drilled them, while the ranks are being led by Captain Huston, Major Dorey, U. S. Army, and Col. Ruppert.

The woods are beginning to call all devotees of the red gods to pitch their tents in the open. That the invitation is heeded the country over is shown by this camp view from Jackson's Hole, in the backwoods of Wyoming.

Boston vs. New York at Boston opened the National League season. On the field the flag was raised while a detachment of sailors and marines, who escorted the players out on the green, stood at attention.

Setting-up exercises for the Yanks at the first local game. Bats are as effective as rifles for this overhead practice.

To the left, sea-bathing on the California coast, where the weather permits a host of film actors, as here, to forget the cares of the close-up in a riot among the waves. Now it is sea-dances instead of tea-dances.