

Etrelliers Church, near the British front in France: another example of the God-fearing work of the modern Alaric. Official photo from Bain News Serv.

Here is, indeed, the glorified snow-fort of our youth. Italian soldiers, sheltered by this deep trench, are holding off the Austrians on the Adamello, along the Trentino front. © Underwood & Underwood

From far Indo-China, France has called in her territorials to defend the tri-color on the western front. These officers, standing by the gate they have named after their hero of the Marne, belong to the Anam battalion. Official photo, from Pictorial Press.

On the right—General Joffre and his wife were the hosts at a reception in Paris for General Pershing. Behind Mme. Joffre is General Pelletier, and standing next to her famous husband are General Dubail and his son. Photo by Kadel & Herbert.

Above—The French troops in the distance have been halted by machine gun fire in a field attack at Juvincourt, on the Aisne front. Under the protection of their own guns they are hastily digging in. © Underwood & Underwood.

Cycle orderlies now replace the picturesque mounted aide-de-camp of the Napoleonic days. These brave Britishers, repairing their machines under fire, doubtless played an important part in transmitting orders for the great British advance in the West. Bain News Serv.

—In France, every man is a servant of the republic. The poilus at the front do not even look up from their work as Commander-in-Chief Petain, followed by General de Mondesir, passes on a tour of inspection. Official photo, from Pictorial Press.

Storm or calm, the British navy stays on the job. This destroyer, on patrol duty, plows unconcernedly through heavy seas. Bain News Serv.
