

This striking picture just received from Germany shows French officers held in a German prison camp burying a dead comrade with full military honors. German school children watched the procession with open-mouthed interest.

Everyone in this quaint Alsatian village turns out to celebrate the anniversary of the arrival of the French troops in Alsace. The little town is gaily decorated with French flags and the people in national dress fill the streets. The old man in the foreground proudly wears the "medaille de la guerre" of 1870.

Kadel & Herbert.

Underwood & Underwood.

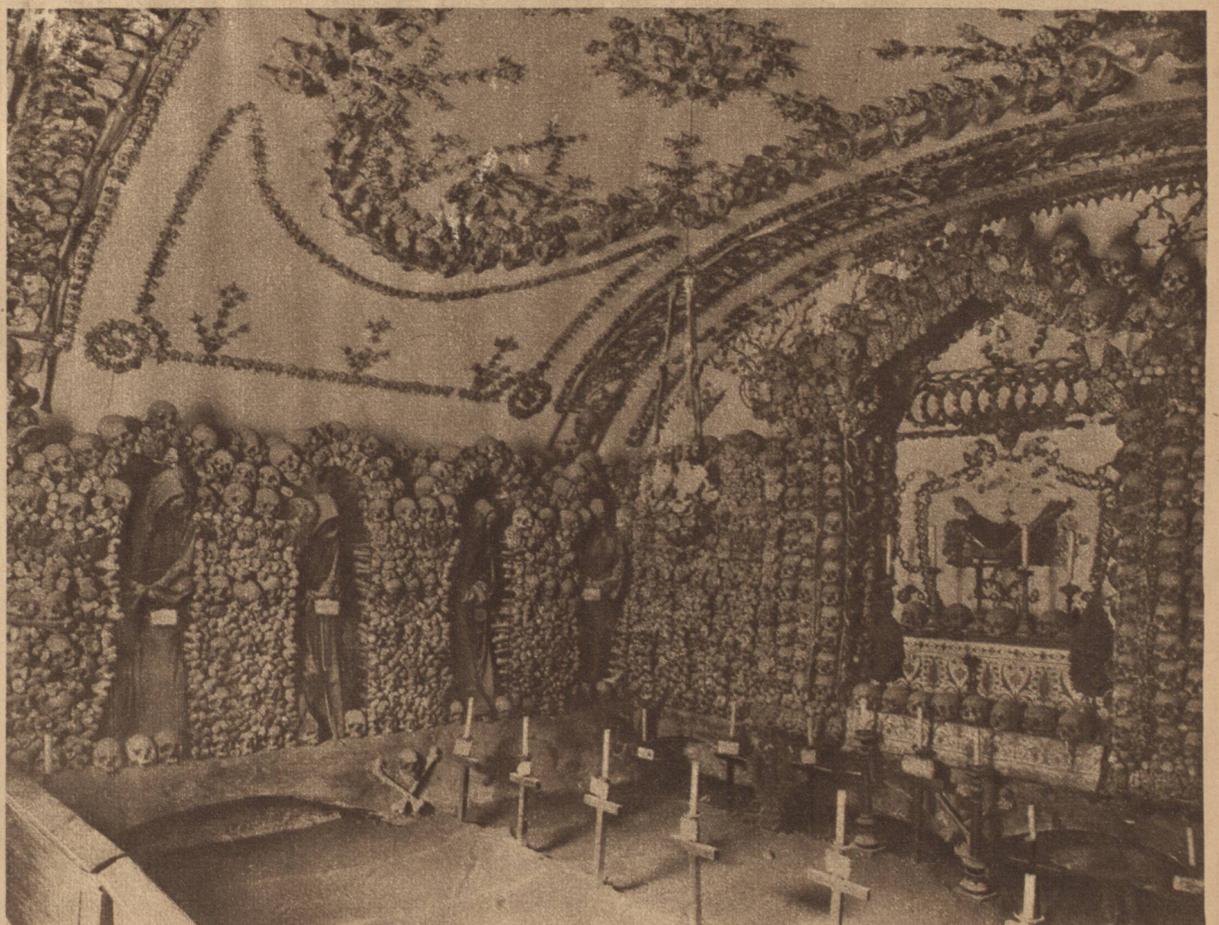

Sandbags make a comfortable (?) mattress for these French soldiers taking a well earned rest in the front line trenches on the Marne. A loaf of bread in the background serves as a counter attraction for rats.

French soldiers examine the wreckage of a German aeroplane shot down somewhere on the Aisne front, and eagerly salvage anything not destroyed by the terrific impact of the fall.

French Official Pictorial Press.

French Official Pictorial Press.

A British officer finds a picture of the Kaiser in a German dug-out which had recently been under fire of the Germans themselves.

American Press.

On the right—One of the gruesome burial vaults beneath the Church of the Santa Maria della Concezione, in Rome, decorated with the bones of about 4,000 departed Capuchin monks. Each vault contains a tomb filled with earth from Jerusalem. For a new interment the bones which have lain longest undisturbed in this holy ground are taken out and used for the ghastly decorations around the chamber.

International.