

Looking across the Hudson from Riverside Drive toward the Palisades and an approaching thunderstorm. Two of Uncle Sam's big dreadnoughts can be seen in the river, the one on the right having brought into play two of her many powerful searchlights.

A. T. Scofield.

On the right—An actual battle line picture, showing a squad of French bombardiers in action. They have just rushed this trench and are preparing to attack the next.

Press Illustrating.

On the right—Two French poilus joyously celebrate outside their rest billets the news that American troops have landed in France.

Kadel & Herbert.

On the Left—A remarkable picture, showing a French seaplane bombing a submarine. The exploding bomb and the wake of the submerged U-boat can be plainly seen.

International.

Below—Night photograph of one of the big British guns making ready to go into action. It is the ceaseless bombardment of British heavy artillery that is largely responsible for the Allies' recent splendid successes in Flanders.

Underwood & Underwood.

