

A tin-helmeted American regiment in France marching back to their billets in the picturesque little valley. In a few weeks these boys will finish their training, and march out to prove themselves in final grips with the Hun.

French Off. from Pictorial Press

On the lookout for enemy planes—Two American boys watching for the first sight of a boche plane. These chaps have finished their training, and are ready for anything Fritz can send along.

Gilliams

Of never ending interest to these little French children—American troops quartered in the village are marching back to billets. One of the little boys, bolder than the rest, trudging along hand-in-hand with one of our officers.

Underwood & Underwood

American officers ready for their first flight over the trenches. The French aviation officers are explaining the system of control and the other vital parts of the construction.

French Off. from Pictorial Press

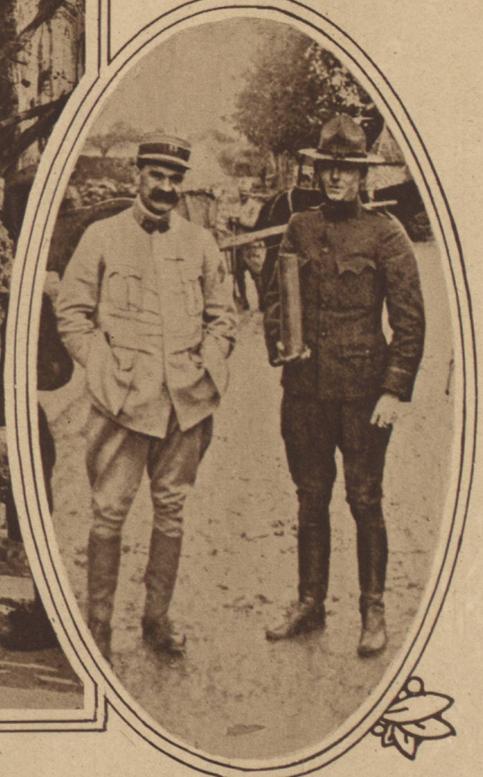

President Wilson and Secretary of War Baker receiving the salutes of troops passing in review at Fort Myer, Virginia.

Underwood & Underwood

Miss Anne Morgan (right), daughter of the late I. P. Morgan, leaving one of the buildings of the American Committee in France, accompanied by M. Fernand David. Miss Morgan has been decorated by the French Minister of Agriculture in recognition of her services in connection with the American Fund for French Wounded. The unit has been engaged in restoring the ruined buildings of the Aisne district, and re-creating a new life for the spirit-broken refugees.

French Off. from Pictorial Press

The first shell case fired by American troops in France against the Germans. The case is being held by an American officer, and is now on its way to President Wilson, who will probably give it to the National Museum for its historic value.

Underwood & Underwood