

A quartet of French poilus survey from the elevation of a ridge a shell-devastated section of French territory that they brought within their lines in the victorious offensive of last October.

French Official from Pict. Press.

Greeted by his wife at the station in Tokio, Lieut.-Commander Isobe of the Japanese Navy returns home after seeing active aeronautical service in France. He looks decidedly ill at ease in the native costume, which he has donned for the occasion.

Bain News.

To the right—A French 120 mm. gun in action. The timber and branches in the foreground are used to camouflage this heavy piece when it is not hurling death into the German lines.

International Film.

Three "Sammies," after visiting a church in the French town in which they are billeted, pose for the photographer, to the delight of the natives.

Underwood & Underwood.

Just to give us an idea of the tremendous size of the French 380 mm. gun, a poilu has comfortably tucked himself into its breach.

International Film.

Belgian stretcher bearers working just back of the firing lines have rescued a soldier overcome in a gas attack and carry him down a camouflaged road to a front line dressing station.

Pict. Press.

A typical example of how our artillery boys at Fort Sheridan (which boasts the country's best trench system) are getting ready for their big job "over there." This American field piece has been carefully protected by sandbags and a camouflage of branches.

International Film.

A vine-covered brick wall makes a splendid trench parapet for these Senegalese troops that are now operating with the French army in the Somme district.

Kodel & Herbert.