

HUN PRISONERS

Here are a few hundreds of the thousands of thousands of captured boches that fill the prison camps of France—thankful for the most part to be out of it.

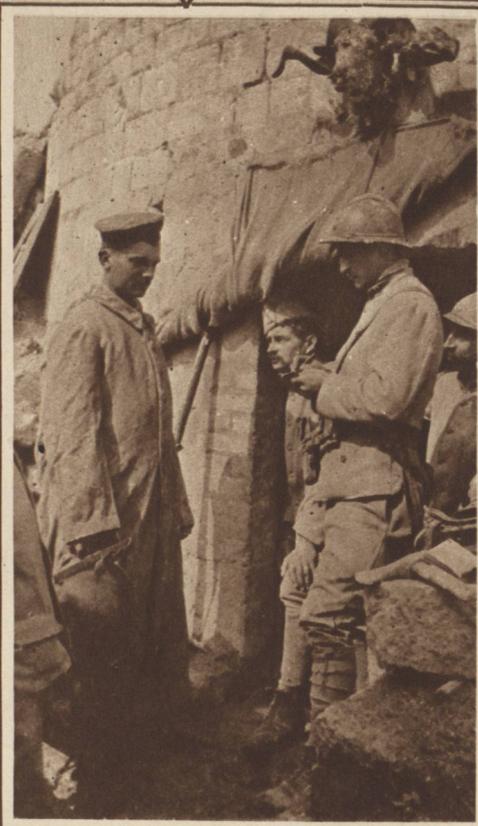

Above—Some of the newest German army draft. Youngsters, in their teens mostly, captured in an attack during the French offensive of October. Relief at their removal from the business end of the French artillery is about their only expression of emotion.

Pictorial Press.

Right—Bringing in boche prisoners after a raid. The man at the left received a bad shell wound in the head which was dressed at the front line dressing station.

Bryan.

Left—A German prisoner just brought in from the firing line is searched and questioned and relieved of his papers by the French before being marched to camp.

Pictorial Press.

Right—A batch of German prisoners just captured. Those on the right are only from 16 to 19 years old. The one with the Red Cross band is a stretcher bearer and will be returned to Germany.

Bryan.

Above—German prisoners in camp on the Meuse front. One of them, utterly tired out, has fallen asleep, much to the amusement of a fellow prisoner.

Pictorial Press.

German prisoners captured by the French line up for their "rations." The food is cooked in large pots, and each man as he steps forward holds out his tin dish for a ladleful.

Pictorial Press.

