Here's how the French attach bombs to their aeroplanes. The bomb is inserted in a tube in the floor of one of the plane's side cars. This type of French aeroplane carries two of these tremendously deadly bombs. Kodak & Herbert.

American chauffeur—a member of the American Fund for French Wounded at Bieracourt in the Aisne sector—having filled her car with clothes and bedding, stops to give the engine final inspection before starting on her journey of mercy among the French peasantry. Miss Anne Morgan, daughter of the late J. Pierpont Morgan, is in charge of this relief work. Pict. Press.

To the left—A picture that gives one a splendid idea of the solidity with which the French build their concrete shelters. This particular one in Belgium is partially camouflaged with branches, and as an added protection scores of sandbags have been piled around the sides and before the entrance. Pict. Press.
