

The bursting of a "Jack Johnson" 40 cm. shell just beyond a Canadian field dressing station. Here the men felt more or less secure, and the wounded can be seen lifting their heads in surprise at the concussion.

Canadian Official from Western Newspaper Union

A British sailor wounded at Ostend, resting up for the next time.

© London Daily Mail from Brown Bros.

This damaged German prisoner, evidently a former professor of Aller-tums-wissenschaft, doesn't seem to know quite what it is all about.

Canadian Official from Western Newspaper Union

The wounded Canadian on the stretcher, although almost unconscious, is clinging tightly to the helmet with which he has just emerged from a hand-to-hand fight with a Boche. He isn't going to let his superior officer even take a look at it.

Press Illustrating Service.

A Canadian Highlander comparing his wounds with those described on the tag attached to the German he has captured.

Canadian Official from Western Newspaper Union

The funeral of Baron von Richthofen, the leader of Germany's fliers, who was shot down behind the British lines. British officers acted as pallbearers, and he was buried with full military honors.

British Official from Underwood & Underwood.