

The sorrows of the war penetrate even into Arabia's remote places. Here we see an Arabian graveyard with women mourners bewailing aloud (as is their custom) relatives lost in the fighting on the Mesopotamian front.

This British soldier is guiding a semaphore in one of the busiest military traffic centres on the British front in France. Western Newspaper Union, British Official.

A bivouac at dawn. Western Newspaper Union.

"I'd like to eat 'em up," says "Tawny Pershing," the lion cub pet of Mrs. H. E. Cole, wife of Lieutenant Cole, U. S. A. International

This once busy corner in the town of Bethune is now without any evidence of life, except the three Tommies walking down the street. As can be seen, the roofs and walls of the buildings remain intact, as does also the famous clock tower, while the windows have been utterly destroyed, the empty spaces serving only to emphasize the desolation within. Western Newspaper Union.

A nice cool place in hot weather is this outlook on the Italian front at Tonale. Western Newspaper Union.