

STEEL

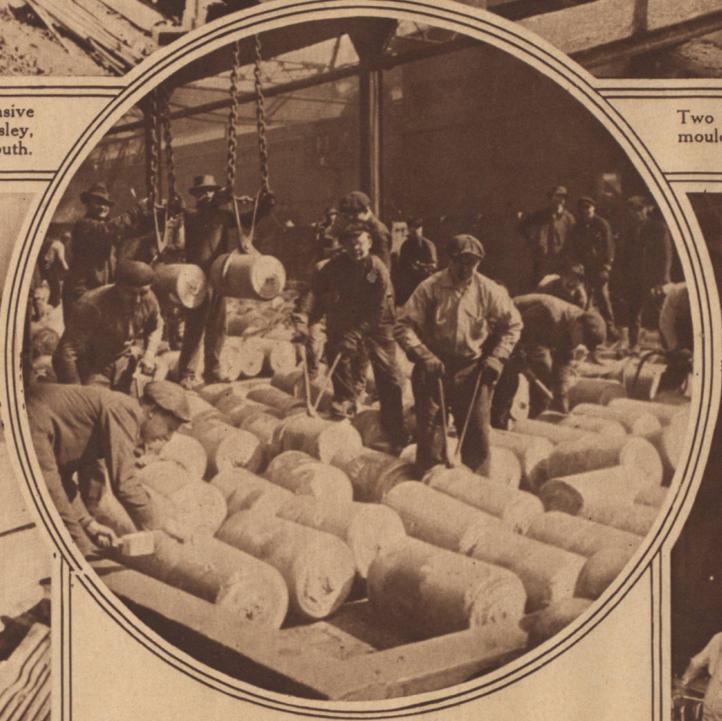

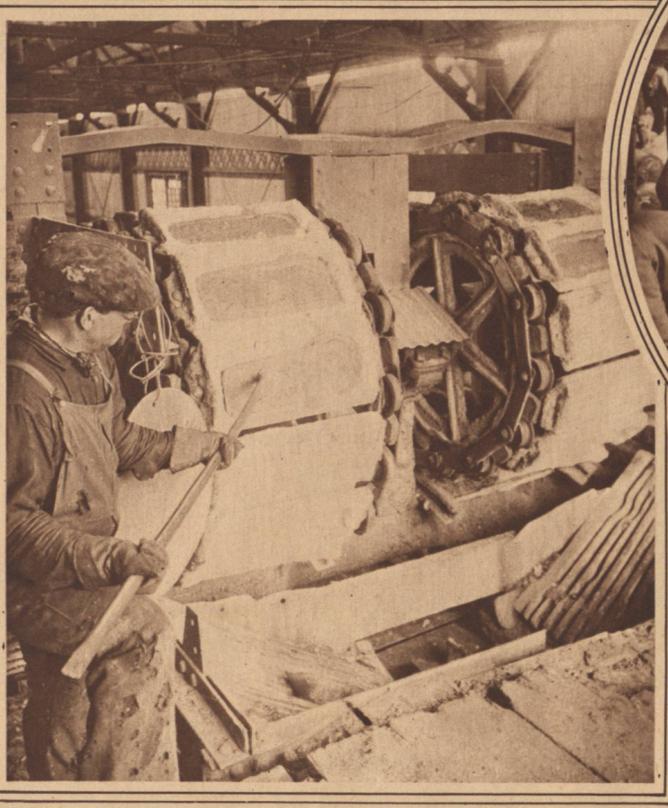

Photographs © Underwood.

America's great steel industry is engaged in one long, unbroken offensive against the Hun. This picture shows some of the blast furnaces at Ensley, just outside of Birmingham, Alabama—the largest plant in the South.

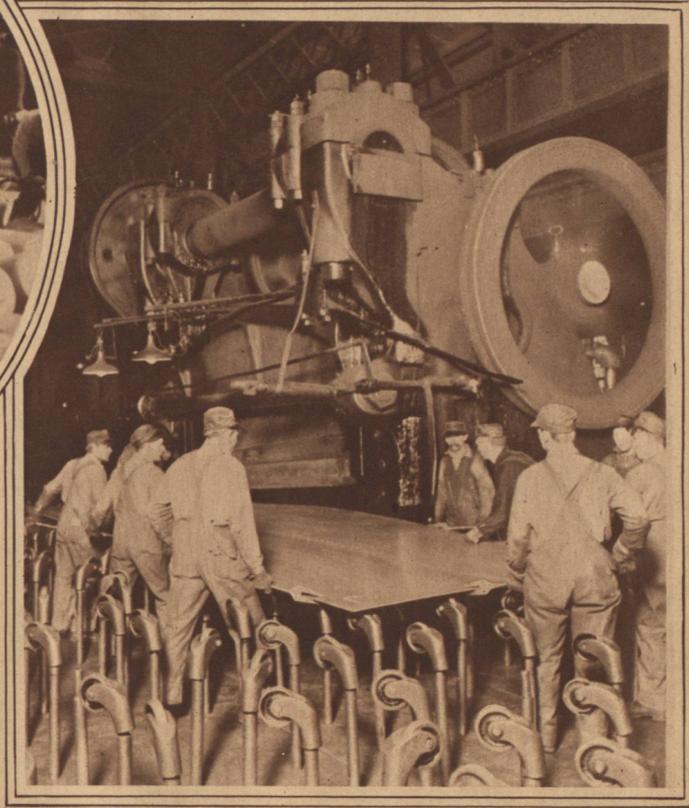

Two mammoth ladles mounted on trucks, pouring molten iron into pig moulds.

These are steel ingots used in making big shells.

Then the pigs are removed from their moulds on the belt conveyors.

A dainty little knife which works like a paper cutter on plate steel, fresh from the rollers.

War-time castles in the sand. These are French kiddies on a beach in France, and their interested audience is made up of British, French and American soldiers and members of the W. A. A. C.

British Official.

Another scene on the same beach. Tommy is trying to persuade the young lady to let him toss her 'way out, and she can't see it at all.

British Official Underwood.