

An interesting chapter of the war belongs to the French colonial fighters. In the picture immediately below are Moroccan troops training at Azemmour. In the picture above we see Algerian tirailleurs just arriving in France.

It doesn't take very long to make a regular poilu of the African. This picture was taken in the Marne sector, and shows a few of the French colonials all ready for action.

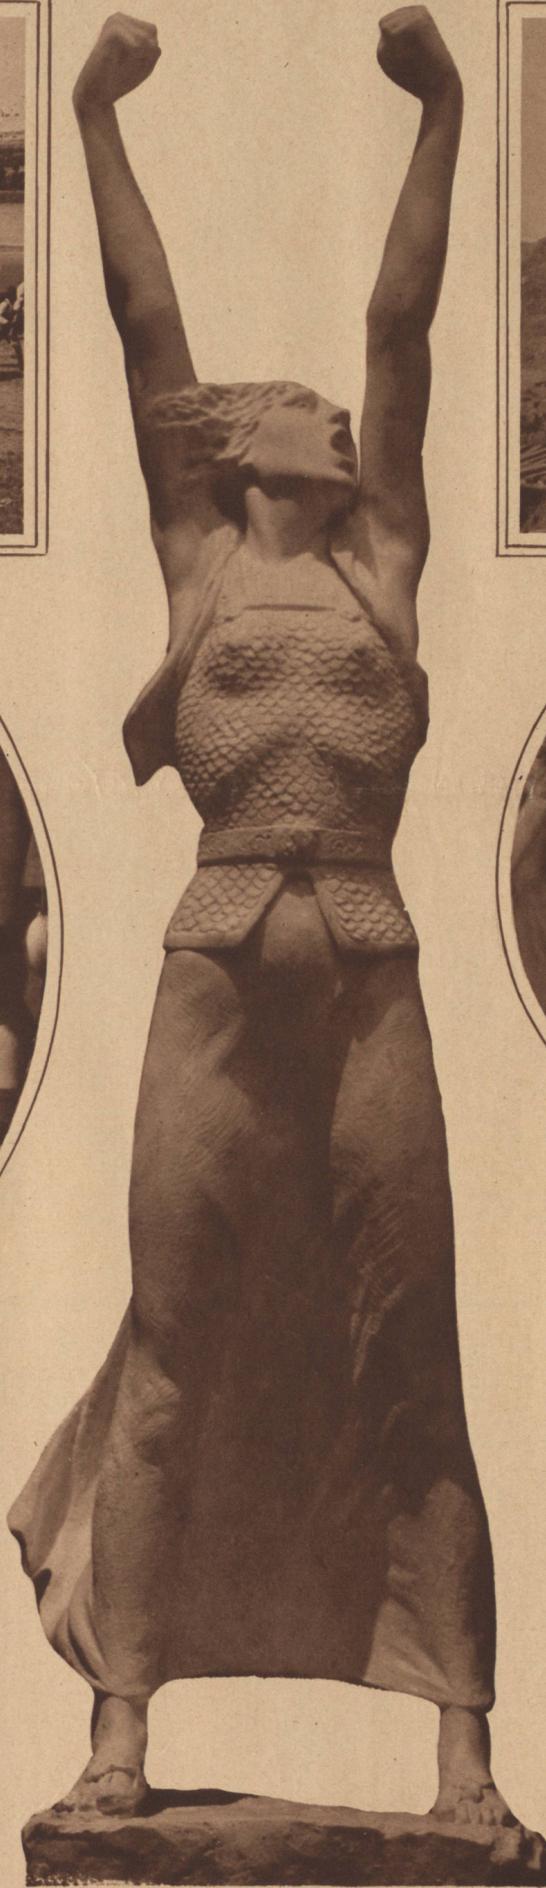

Photos © Press Illustrating Service.

This is Lisette — four years old, with her Red Cross basket.

"Red Cross buns"—an afternoon gouter in Paris.

"THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE"

The remarkable statue by the American sculptor, Jo Davidson, which is to be erected on the battlefield of the Marne by the Spirit of France Committee of New York. The statue at present is in the sculptor's Macdougall Alley studio. © Vander Weyde, New York.

Luncheon is normally an important meal in a French family, but with father at the front and mother, most likely, away all day working, it had, for many kiddies, become a very dismal affair—until the American Red Cross stepped in and established schools where bountiful midday lunches are served.

Henri's mother has tuberculosis; but an American doctor and a French nurse are determined that Henri shall grow up to be a rugged citizen. The American Red Cross and the Rockefeller Commission for the Prevention of Tuberculosis in France are working over there side by side. Photos by Paul Thompson.