

IMMORTAL SAYINGS OF IMMORTAL AMERICANS

The soul of the nation, as its inspired sons have set it forever in words. The list as completed by heroes of the present war.

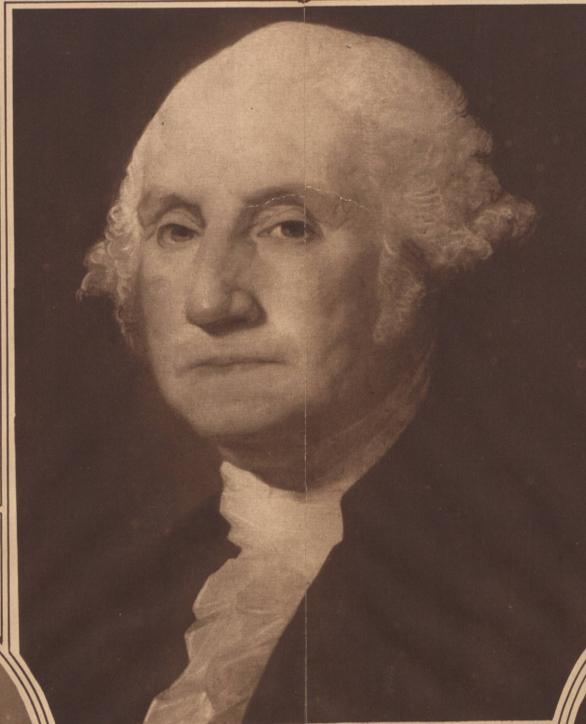

Photographs © Underwood & Underwood

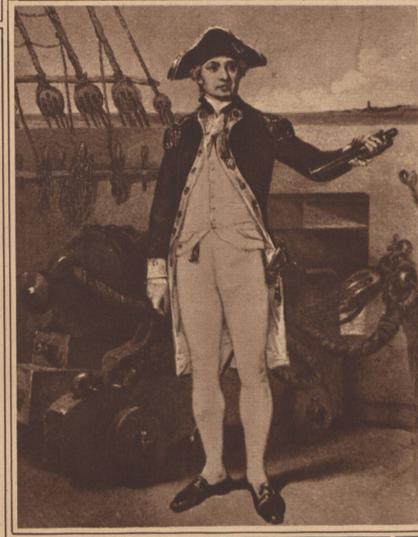

Captain Parker, to the Minute Men at Lexington: "If they want a war, let them begin it here."

Patrick Henry, before the (Va.) Provincial Convention: "Give me liberty, or give me death."

Washington, in his farewell address: "Observe good faith and justice toward all nations."

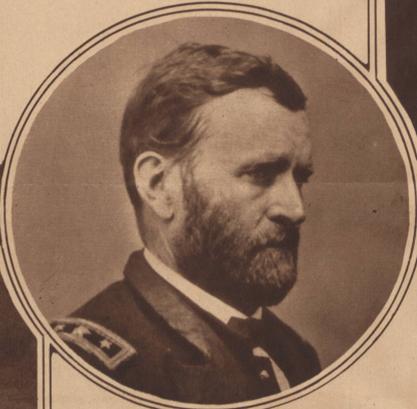

John Paul Jones, on the Bonhomme Richard in battle with the Serapis, asked to surrender: "I have just begun to fight."

Commodore Perry, reporting his victory on Lake Erie: "We have met the enemy, and they are ours."

Captain James Lawrence, mortally wounded on the Chesapeake in battle with the Shannon: "Don't give up the ship."

Grant, at Spottsylvania Court House, in a dispatch to Lincoln when the Confederates were holding him: "I propose to fight it out on this line, if it takes all summer."

Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, Ambassador to France, in reply to Talleyrand's hint for a bribe: "Millions for defence, but not one cent for tribute."

Wilson, in his address to Congress, April 2, 1916, advising Congress to declare war on Germany: "The world must be made safe for democracy."

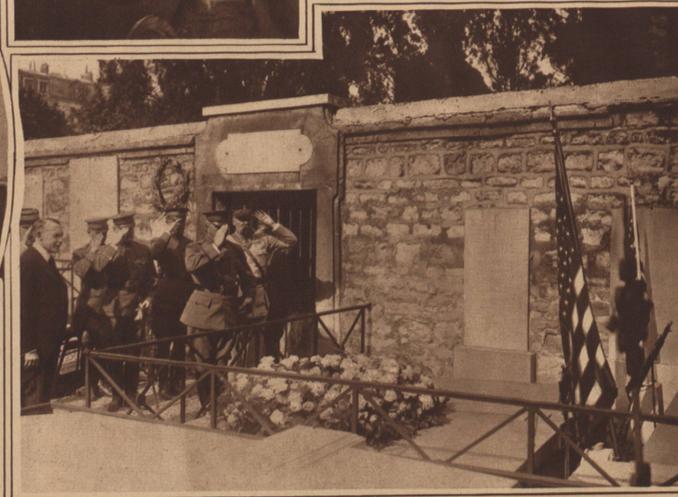

Nathan Hale, about to be executed as a spy: "I regret that I have only one life to lose for my country."

Admiral Farragut, warned of torpedoes in the attack on New Orleans in the Civil War: "Damn the torpedoes! Full steam ahead."

General John A. Dix, Secretary of the Treasury under Buchanan, in an order to a lieutenant at New Orleans regarding Brashwood, a refractory slavery sympathizer: "If any man attempts to haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot."

General Pershing, newly arrived in France at the head of the American Army, on his reverent visit to Lafayette's tomb: "Lafayette, we are here."

Lincoln (Louis Mayer's new bust, highly praised by Charles W. Eliot, Henry Watterson, George Haven Putnam and others, here first pictured by Van der Weyde): "Government of the people, for the people, by the people."

Captain "Jack" Philip, on the old Texas at the victory of Santiago, his decks littered with wounded Spanish sailors, to his own men: "Don't cheer, boys; the poor fellows are dying."

Admiral Dewey, on his flagship Olympia, leading the fleet to battle in Manila Bay, Spanish War, to his flag captain: "You may fire when ready, Gridley."

Major General Bundy, at Chateau Thierry, at the peak of the German drive on Paris: "My men would not understand the order to retreat."

Lieutenant Colonel Charles W. Whittlesey, leader of the "Lost Battalion," surrounded and starving in the Argonne Forest, in reply to a German demand for his surrender: "Go to hell!"