

SPECIAL DELIVERY!

These pictures show two of Uncle Sam's methods of carrying mail. Over large tracts of frozen Alaska the only available service depends upon dogs and sled. Here in New York we are already growing quite accustomed to the "airplane mail only" box.

11. From C. A. Clay.
12. Tribune Graphic Service.

Be not too critical, for this is Yuzo Tsubouchi's first dancing lesson. Yuzo's decision to go on the stage is held to be one of the most revolutionary things in the history of Nipponese drama because of his social prominence.

© Adachi.

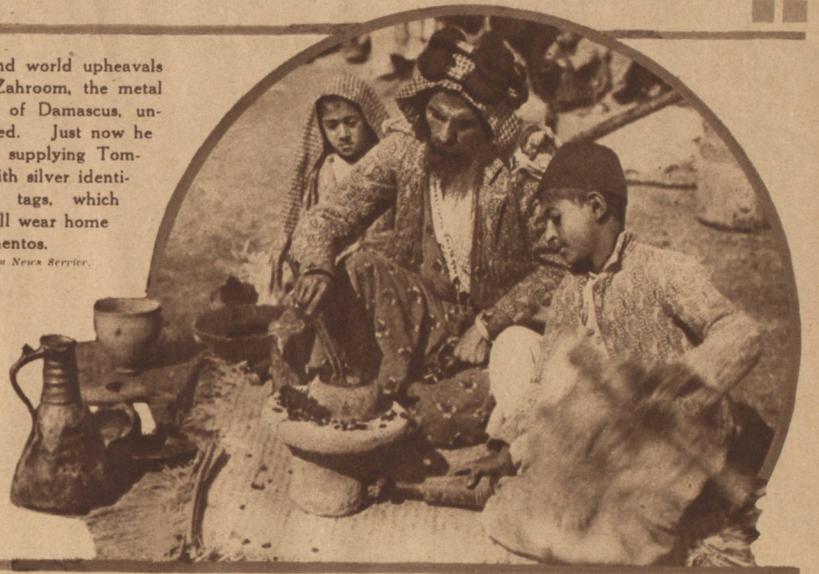

This is London's smallest house. At least the hazard is a pretty safe one. Tucked in between pretentious dwellings in Hyde Park Place, it is just big enough for a front door and one upstairs window. Tradition says it was built in the '70s by a Mrs. Jupp and designed as a residence for her maid.

Typical Press Agency

War and world upheavals leave Zahroom, the metal worker of Damascus, undisturbed. Just now he is busy supplying Tommies with silver identification tags, which they will wear home as mementos.

Bain News Service.

These pictures show two embassies in Berlin which have long since fallen into disuse: the French embassy above, and the British on the left. It would be hard to find two houses more significantly bleak and deserted. With doors locked and windows boarded up, they stand eloquent testimony to the completeness of Berlin's isolation during the war.

Gillman Service.