Confession of H. H. Holmes.

The case of the murder House is one of the most extraordinary in the criminal history of the world. So great was the public interest in his story as revealed at his recent trial that it would be superfluous to recount the facts of his crimes. Finding that there is no possibility of staying the issue, and that he will certainly go to the scaffold on May 7, Holmes has made a complete confession. This startling story is told with a candor and circumspection that make his narrative one of the most interesting and extraordinary psychological studies ever published.

The following statement was written by Holmes in Philadelphia to The Journal of N.Y. as a fine drizzle commenced in all particular... It is the only confession of any of my professions. I have ever made while the rain was pouring down and the steam from the city streets was rising in clouds. I went to the scaffold on May 7, 1896.
